

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. THE INDIAN BUDGET—FINANCIAL STATEMENT—

The Secretary of State for India (Lord G. Hamilton, Middlesex, Ealing) 1345

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Lord G. Hamilton.)

DISCUSSION :—

Sir Henry Fowler (Wolverhampton, E.) 1366
Mr. Souttar (Dumfriesshire) 1372

Sir William Wedderburn (Banffshire) 1379

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'looking to the special needs of the famine-stricken people in India at the present time, this House recognises that funds are urgently required to feed, clothe, and house the cultivators in their villages until their crops are ripe; to provide them with plough cattle, seed, and other requisites of cultivation; and to restore them to their normal economic condition; that these requirements cannot be adequately met from Indian revenues raised from the suffering Indian people, and within the necessarily restricted field of ordinary relief operations; that the funds subscribed by charity are altogether insufficient for these purposes; and this House is therefore of opinion that a large and generous free grant should be provided to assist in meeting this unprecedented calamity,' instead thereof."—(Mr. Souttar)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

DISCUSSION :—

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL — SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS.

LORD HARRIS: My Lords, in moving that the Standing Orders be dispensed with in regard to these nine Provisional Order Bills, I would point out that the delay in the introduction of the Bills has not been due to the Local Government Board. There was some delay by the printer, which, added to the abnormal length of the Whitsuntide recess and the fact that there was some opposition in the House of Commons, accounts for the late period at which the Bills come up to your Lordships; but I understand that the Chairman of Committees has no objection to the Standing Orders being suspended.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): There have been a great many Bills this year—a larger number than I ever remember in any previous session—in connection with which this Standing Order has been dispensed with. I quite admit that the delay is not so much the fault of the Local Government Board, but I must warn my noble friend that if there is any opposition I cannot undertake to have the Bills referred to Select Committees. There are a number of unopposed Bills yet to be dealt with.

On Question, agreed to; Bills read 2^a accordingly.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: I have an exactly similar motion to move in connection with four Irish Bills, and I hope the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees will raise no objection.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I must give the same answer to the noble Earl. If the Bills are unopposed I shall make no objection, but if they are opposed I cannot undertake to have them considered.

On Question, agreed to. Bills read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

HOME DEFENCE — MILITARY RESOURCES.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I beg to give notice that on Friday week

I shall ask the Prime Minister the following questions—

"(1) Whether he or his colleagues have ever received information of expressions of opinion, from reliable sources, confirming the view of one of our Foreign Military Attachés, recently quoted in debate, to the effect that 'It is all-important that England should be strong and unassailable in the month of November next.'

"(2) Whether he is of opinion that the European situation is now less alarming than it seemed to him on the 9th of May last, when he spoke to the Prinrose League as follows :— 'It is not necessarily because in themselves they are more important, but if you look around you will see that the elements and causes of menace and peril are, though slowly, accumulating, and may accumulate to such a point as to require our most earnest and active effort to repel them.'

"(3) Whether, as Prime Minister, responsible for our national safety, he has carefully inquired into our home land defensive means and organisation, and has satisfied himself that these are such as, failing the fleet, will render all attempts at invasion by any hostile nation futile and impossible of success.

"(4) Whether, if not satisfied as to the sufficiency and organisation of our home land defences, he will cause such measures to be taken as will give us the required security against the possibility of successful invasion by any hostile Power."

I placed on the Paper of your Lordships' House some time ago a request for a Return which would give us all the particulars with reference to our defensive position, but the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War declined to grant the Return. The information, however, is known to the members of the Foreign Embassies. I asked one of those members if there was any information in the Return for which I asked which he could not supply, and he replied, "We know nothing." The Prime Minister, if he wishes to inform himself as to the state of things, has nothing to do but to send this paper to the Secretary of State for War and get it filled up.

INDIAN FAMINE—PRESENT OUTLOOK.

LORD SANDHURST: My Lords, I beg to ask the noble Earl the Under-Secretary of State for India a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether he can give the House any information with regard to the monsoon in India which may possibly tend to alleviate anxiety.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of ONSLOW): My Lords, the Secretary of State has received a telegram from the Viceroy of India which, I am happy to say, puts a rather improved complexion upon affairs, which had begun to assume alarming conditions owing to the failure of the monsoon. The Viceroy telegraphed the day before yesterday as follows—

"Heavier and more general rain during last week in Berar, Central Provinces and Hyderabad. Rainfall good and sufficient for present needs in Rajputana. In Central India moderate general rain and sowings commenced in parts. Fair rain has fallen in Bombay, Deccan and Khondeoh. Monsoon is heavy in Surat. Good falls are reported in Kathiawar, Broach, Thana. Sufficient rain has not yet fallen in Punjab for dry land sowing. Notwithstanding that prospects have improved, no early diminution of relief is possible. On the contrary, the figures this week are the highest yet reported. Village relief and advances are replacing relief works. Condition of surviving cattle is deplorable in Western India. Cholera continues prevalent Bombay. Health Returns for Central Provinces are satisfactory. Number of persons in receipt of relief, 6,148,000."

RITUALISM IN THE CHURCH.

*THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: My Lords, in rising to call attention to the continued lawlessness in the Church of England, and to ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to give effect to the Resolution of the House of Commons of Wednesday, 10th May, 1899†, I shall confine my remarks to those particular cases in which the clergy have not only revolted against the lawful authority of the highest Court, but against the opinions of the two Archbishops and the moral authority of their ecclesiastical superiors. I do not think that it would be desirable that I should occupy your Lordships' time by entering at any length into the cases outside these—they are indeed very numerous—in which the spirit of the Reformation, and the spirit of the Protestant settlement is continuously and sedulously broken by these offending clergymen. I will confine myself, as I have said, to cases of definite contempt of the law of the land and of episcopal authority. I come first to the question of incense and processional lights. The use of incense was condemned as illegal as long ago as 1868 in the case of Martin v. Machonochie, and again in the case of Elphinstone v. Purchas. Processional lights were declared illegal in the Purchas case, but their use is still continued. About a year or eighteen months ago I called attention in this House to the proceedings that were taking place at a particular church in North Kensington in respect to the ceremonial use of incense and processional lights, and the answer I then received was that these matters had been relegated by mutual consent to the decision of the two Archbishops.* I will read to your Lordships what the opinion of the two Archbishops was. They said—

"We are obliged to come to the conclusion that the use of incense in the public worship and as a part of that worship is not at present enjoined nor permitted by the law of the Church of England, and it is our duty to request the clergy who so use it to discontinue that use. If used at all it must be used (in George Herbert's language) to sweeten the church and outside the worship altogether. It is obvious at once that precisely the same line of reasoning is applicable to the case of processions carrying lights as we have applied to the case of incense. There is no authority for such processions, and they are therefore neither enjoined nor permitted."

After this opinion of the two Archbishops we were treated to a very remarkable lay protest. A deputation waited upon the most rev. Prelate the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the language they used in the memorial they presented was most significant as showing contempt, not only for the law of the land, but for their ecclesiastical superiors. In the memorial which they presented to the most rev. Prelate they made use of these words—

"We as Catholic lay people will resist to the utmost a precedent which may lead us into a position differing but little from that against which the Church rightly protested 300 years ago. We protest against your Grace's attempt to foist upon the Church a penal Act of Parliament passed in days of regal autocracy, and we are the more aggrieved because we were led to suppose that your Grace had intended to investigate the question upon the principles of Catholic law, and not upon the construction of the alleged law of the State."

I wish to express the greatest possible deference and respect to the most rev. Prelate, but I do not think that he was justified in receiving a deputation that chose to employ such language towards him. Whatever our opinion may be as to the views or the policy that may have been taken by the most rev. Prelate, I do not think there is any Member of your Lordships' House who doubts that whatever faults people may suppose to belong to him he is certainly a man of strict justice. If the most rev. Prelate's self-respect did not forbid his officially recognising those who charged him with animus and partiality—for that is the meaning of the words "your Grace's attempt to foist upon the Church"—he should remember that he holds an office of the greatest dignity and subject to the conditions of an Established Church and therefore to the law of the land, and that so long as he enjoys the advantages of his position he is also bound by its limitations and bound to recognise no law other than the actual law which is the law of the State. I do not think it is necessary that I should occupy your Lordships' time by dwelling at any length upon the elaborate reply which the most rev. Prelate addressed to that deputation. The pith of the whole matter is contained in these words, which form part of the reply. Speaking of the opinion of the two Archbishops, which we understood was set up to meet the views of those who declined to recognise the authority of the Privy Council, the most rev. Prelate said that—

"Although the Archbishop has addressed these words to the whole Province, certainly I am not going to admit that the Archbishop has not a right to address every clergyman in his Province—certainly he has not implied that this opinion of his is to be taken as a command to obey unless their Bishops enforce it. It is left for the Bishops to call upon the clergy to take this opinion but if they do not choose to act in this way that of course would set the clergy in that diocese perfectly free from obedience to that opinion. The clergy may very fairly say in that case 'my bishop does not call upon me to obey this opinion, therefore I am not bound by it.'"

Now, my Lords, what does that mean? It means that, instead of the opinions of the two Archbishops being taken and recognised as binding morally upon the clergy, the words are practically only a phrase and simply carry with them moral authority where and when a particular Bishop in a particular diocese chooses to enforce it. I venture to say that that entirely and absolutely gives away the whole case and the whole reason for this tribunal; it is not a legal tribunal, but it was supposed to have some moral authority. The opinion of the two Archbishops was supposed to be, not their individual opinion as Archbishops, but their opinion as the ecclesiastical superiors in the

Church of England. I, perhaps, have spoken somewhat strongly upon this point, but I have not spoken one word more strongly than did the late Archbishop Benson. No doubt many of your Lordships have read that very interesting life which has been published of him by his son, and in that book you will find Bishop Westcott's recollections of Archbishop Benson (Vol. xi., p. 697). Speaking of the opinion of Archbishop Benson, Bishop Westcott says—

"He thought the Bishops were becoming ministers of a diocese and not of a church. 'Diocesanism,' he said, 'is a new form of dissent, as virulent as congregationalism, and more.'"

While I deplore the language of the most rev. Prelate I still more deplore the consequences which it has produced. The Archbishops' advice has been gratefully accepted by the sacerdotal Bishops. It was not likely that the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Lincoln would have cared, even if such words had not been spoken, to obey this opinion, for, within a fortnight of a unanimous decision of the Lambeth Conference forbidding the use of incense and processional lights he preached at what was advertised as High Mass at St. Mary Magdalen, Paddington. The Daily News, speaking of that service, said—

"It may be remarked without prejudice that anyone who had witnessed High Mass in a Roman Catholic Church might well—what with the wearing of eucharistic vestments by the officiating clergy, the proceedings at the altar, the bell at consecration, the elevation of the host, the lights and the ceremonial use of incense—have imagined that he was in a Roman place of worship but for the employment of the English tongue instead of the Latin."

Since the opinion of the Archbishops was published what has happened? Why, incense is used in the different dioceses throughout England just as it was before. In London to-day it is used in twenty-five churches. At Perivale a clergyman says he is permitted to use it before and after service with the Bishop's permission and "non-ceremonial use" during the service. In the diocese of Chester—I am quoting from the Church Times of 13th October, 1899—a vicar, acting in accordance with the Bishop's advice, proposes in future to use incense during the singing of the hymn immediately preceding the service of Holy Communion; and in the Exeter Diocese the vicar of St. John, Sutton, informed the Bishop that he would confine the use of incense to High Mass. I have touched as cursorily as I could upon these various matters. But, as Mr. Balfour said in the other House, in his speech on the Church Discipline Bill, "What we object to, after all, is not solely or mainly aberrations of ritual." "I think," he said, "that every member of the English Church has a right to have a service in harmony with the spirit of the Prayer-book." I should like to know if any one of the Bishops that I see opposite me this evening has called effectively upon his clergy to give up reservation. I do not believe there is one. I now come to a point which to my mind is one of principle. The questions of incense and processional lights are not in themselves important ones. They are only important as proving what I allude to in my notice as the continued lawlessness in the Church of England. I now come to a very much more serious matter—one which strikes at the root of the real difference between the English Church and the Church of Rome—I mean Holy Communion taking place in cases in which no one communicates except the priest. On this point the rubric says—

"And there shall be no celebration of the Lord's Supper except there be a convenient number to communicate with the priest, and, if there be not above twenty persons in the parish of discretion to receive the communion, yet there shall be no communion except four, or three at least, communicate with the priest."

The rubric is definite, distinct, and absolute on the point. You will find exactly the same teaching running through the other rubrics—

"The priest shall then place on the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient. At the time of the celebration of the communion, the communicants being conveniently placed for the receiving of the Holy Sacrament."

And again—

"Then the priest shall say to them that come to receive the Holy Communion."

And again—

"Then shall this general confession be made in the name of all them that are minded to receive the Holy Communion."

In view of the manner in which some of the earlier Prayer-books have been quoted as more particularly representing the true and proper foundation of the Catholic faith, it is curious to remember that in the first Prayer-book of Edward VI. we find the direction—

"Then so many as shall be partakers of the Holy Communion shall tarry still in the quire ;

all other that mind not to receive the said Holy Communion shall depart out of the quire."

The second Prayer-book of Edward VI. omitted this, perhaps because the congregation was no longer invited to come into the choir to deposit alms in the box which used to stand near the altar, or perhaps because a rubric was then first introduced directing that the table at the time of the communion should stand in the body of the church. Be that as it may the following words were added to the form of exhortation to be said "at certain times"—

"As whereas ye offend God so sore in refusing this Holy Banquet I admonish, exhort, and beseech you that ye will not add any more, which thing ye shall do if ye stand by as gazers and lookers on them that do communicate, and be no partakers of the same yourselves. For what thing can this be accounted else than a further contempt and unkindness towards God?"

With regard to the present Prayer-book the Lord Bishop of London, in a charge delivered at St. Paul's Cathedral on 21st February of this year, said—

"The point I wish to emphasise is that the object of the Church of England at the Reformation was to turn the Mass into a Communion. If there are to be no communicants at mid-day, then it is difficult to avoid something which looks perilously like 'turning the Communion into Mass.'"

He also said—

"It is this which creates suspicion and puts a hindrance in the way of many who are honestly trying to adapt the services of the Church to the changed circumstances of modern life."

How are those views carried out in the right rev. Prelate's own diocese? Between 31st March and 7th May there were in the diocese of London fifty churches that disobeyed the Rubric, twenty-five having midday Communion without any communicants except the priest, fifteen with only one communicant, and ten with only two communicants. One cannot be too careful in these matters to be able as one goes along to verify every fact. Of these fifty churches that disobey the Rubric six were visited yesterday, and in those six churches—St. Clement's, City Road; St. Michael's, Shoreditch; St. Augustine's, Stepney; St. Cuthbert's, Philbeach Gardens; St. John the Baptist, Holland Road; and St. Alban's, Holborn—there were Communion, but there was not one single communicant except the priest. A very curious thing happened at St. Augustine's, Stepney. At that church

The Earl of Portsmouth.

the clergyman took his sermon from the apocryphal book Ecclesiasticus, chapter 50, verse 10, and said that as God's representative he could perform the holy Mass, that he alone could make Christ really present in the elements, that he alone could give absolution for sin, and declared confession to be necessary. I think the instances I have quoted are indicative of a very serious condition of affairs. But before I leave this point I cannot omit to notice a resolution which was passed unanimously by the members of the English Church Union, in which they, in precise, clear, and definite words, pronounce their devotion and adherence to the doctrine of transubstantiation. The resolution was as follows—

"We, the members of the English Church Union, holding fast to the faith and teaching of the one Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church—that in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper the bread and wine, through the operation of the Holy Ghost, become, in and by consecration, according to our Lord's institution, verily and indeed the body and blood of Christ, and that Christ our Lord, present in the same most Holy Sacrament of the altar under the form of bread and wine, is to be worshipped and adored—desire, in view of present circumstances, to reaffirm, in accordance with the teaching of the Church, our belief in the verity of the Christian faith, and to declare that we shall abide by all such teaching and practice as follow from this doctrine of the whole Catholic Church of Christ."

There can be no doubt from those words that a certain body of self-constituted persons in the Church of England distinctly claim the right to define the doctrines and the teaching of the Church of England. I do not speak for any one section of the Church; but it is obvious that if any one section of the Church or body are permitted with impunity to make their own special declaration of what these doctrines are, and to give effect to them by particular services, the condition of the Church of England must be anarchical, and that the existence of the established position of the Church of England must cease. I have confined myself only to those points in which the offending clergy have disobeyed both the law of the land and the moral authority of the Archbishops, and of their ecclesiastical superiors. I hope, my Lords, that I have treated sacred matters—for indeed they are sacred matters—with the reverent reserve they should command. But I cannot understand the frame of mind which induces men to claim respect for their position and to retain office when they repudiate all lawful and moral authority. I do not fail to appreciate the devoted lives and noble self-denial of these men—their devoted lives speak with special force to many, for the tendency is, perhaps, to make too little of personal religion and to make the Church of primary instead of secondary importance—but, when all is said, the Church is not a club or an association of Christian gentlemen for moral and social improvement. The whole basis of the Church of England as an established Church depends upon law, and the clergyman, unlike those of any other Church, holds his living as a freehold. If a Roman Catholic priest refuses to submit to lawful authority he can practically be unfrocked, because he can be forbidden to say Mass. If a minister of one of the Free Churches refuses to carry out the conditions under which his chapel is held he is liable for a breach of trust, and also to the legal penalties of the Court of Chancery. I wish to treat the Roman Catholic doctrines and faith with all the respect they deserve. But Roman Catholic doctrines and practices, without Roman Catholic discipline, and under the prestige and protection of a Protestant Established Church, is, I maintain, incapable of either respect or of apology. Those who wish to see the law maintained do not ask from the clergy of the Established Church any ideal standard; they only ask that they shall be prevented from retaining office the conditions attached to which they refuse to obey. Those conditions are not narrow or restricted. The English Prayer-book is not inquisitorial. It does not seek to define the spirit or the sense in which the communicants receive Holy Communion. It only stipulates that the service shall be performed in a prescribed way. It is a liberal and a comprehensive compromise. The Prayer-book, interpreted by the highest tribunal of the realm, must be and can be the only basis of authority in the Established Church, and those who decline to accept that compromise ought to make up their minds, or have their minds made up for them by others, to go elsewhere. The resolution of 10th May, 1899, which was moved by my noble and learned friend the Master of the Rolls (Lord Alverstone) admitted that if the efforts of the Bishops were not speedily effectual further legislation would be required "to maintain the observance of the existing laws of Church and Realm." Since the passing of that resolution the Bishops have failed, as indeed, my Lords, if their hearts had been in it, they would have been bound to fail. It is all very well to talk about fatherly advice, but what is the use of fatherly advice without parental control? During the progress of the Church Patronage Bill in this House the noble Marquess suggested that a fund should be applicable to proceedings against clergy in cases of gross disobedience to the law. The most rev. Prelate said he never could agree to that, because the funds were applicable to the poorer clergy and he referred to the straitened circumstances of those clergy. What is the position of the Bishops in this matter? The Bishops are not rich men; they are not in receipt of incomes which, considering the enormous claims upon them, leave any margin. They cannot institute costly legal proceedings, and these clergymen know that under the existing state of the law the Bishops have no coercive power. They, therefore, carry on their practices with impunity. But since the passing of the resolution in the House of Commons the Protestant laity have grown into an organised and determined party, with just that touch of fanaticism which is so conducive, judging by experience, to political results; although the war may have absorbed the attention of the London press and of certain classes, the middle classes and the working men in the north and in all the great towns feel very deeply upon this subject, and are not prepared to allow their patriotic zeal in supporting Her Majesty's Government against the enemies of this country abroad to be utilised, if I may so express it, as a political expedient for cheating them out of promised legislation. Knowing as I do these organisations in the north, I should regret it if this matter is allowed to pass out of the hands of a responsible Government. I hope, therefore, that the noble Marquess will be able to give some assurance that a practical measure will be introduced and carried through this House with the sole object of making the clergy obey the law.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, it is, no doubt, perfectly true that the opinions of the Archbishops, communicated through the

Bishops to the clergy, have not been so speedily obeyed as might have been expected before those opinions were given; but, at the same time, I must remind the House that this is not the first time that I have prayed your Lordships to remember the difficulties of dealing with such matters as these, where men's consciences are so very much strained, where men feel so very strongly, and where it is exceedingly difficult for men to change the course that they had previously pursued, and very difficult indeed for them to dis sever themselves from those with whom they have previously acted. And I have urged before, as I must urge again, that in such matters it is really necessary, unless you would do most serious injustice, to be patient in dealing with offenders of this kind, who are perplexed by the position in which they find themselves, who very largely indeed really desire to obey the voice of authority, but who, at the same time, are held back by very natural feelings and by the belief that practices which they have pursued are really within the law of the Church. The Archbishops gave an opinion on the question of the use of incense. I do not suppose that any of the Bishops, or the Archbishops themselves, at all expected that in every single instance the clergymen would immediately obey. I do not suppose, indeed, that the Bishops expected that there would be such an approach to obedience as has been actually made. I confess, and I said it before anything of this sort occurred, that I expected that there would be some who would stand out against everything that we could say upon the matter; and I urged that we ought to allow time for what was said to operate on their minds, and that I believed that if patience were practised in this way we might save the Church of England from the great disaster of the disruption of the whole body. I repeat, that the opinions expressed in regard to incense have been very largely followed. It is not the case that those opinions of the Archbishops have been disregarded by the clergy altogether. It is not the case that they have been disregarded even by a majority of those who previously continued in this practice. The great majority have already conformed to what the Bishops have urged upon them, and this is exactly what we hoped. I have no doubt at all that in the course of time we shall succeed in bringing all these clergymen to understand that what we are asking them to do is to submit to the law of the Church to which they belong, and that we are not asking them to give up anything that is permitted by that law. The opinions on the question of reservation have not yet had time to take possession of men's minds in the same degree. There are, I have no doubt, still a great many who practise what, in our judgment, we pronounced to be outside the law; but we receive expressions of opinion on all hands, even from those who are really disturbed in mind upon the matter, which indicate that by giving a little more time we shall succeed in very largely altering these practices also; and I do not think it would be well for the Church if any violent means were used at the present time to compel obedience, instead of winning it by quiet and steady perseverance. It is true, of course, that there are great diversities of opinion in the Church. It is true that there are men whose opinions on the subject of Holy Communion go very far in the direction of the Roman Catholic doctrine. But even those who signed the declaration which was published the other day would, as far as I believe, with but very few exceptions, repudiate altogether the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, and would declare that they do not mean that and do not intend to teach it. And, my Lords, it must always be borne in mind that these questions are very often very difficult to handle, and that it is quite possible to mistake men's meaning when you are dealing with the words which they use. The quotations which the noble Earl has given us seem very near to the Roman doctrine—and yet those who know the subject well can see a distinction, and the distinction is real and deep—and it is quite certain that the body of the clergy of the Church of England do not hold, and are not prepared to hold, and will not hold the Roman doctrine in this matter. Further, it must be remembered that in regard to the administration of the rubrics, it is very often very difficult now to do what would have been comparatively easy two hundred years ago, when it was the practice for no one to come to the Holy Communion without previously giving notice to the priests in accordance to the rubric. It was very easy for the priest to pass over the occasion when he found there was not sufficient number to communicate with ~~him~~. But that practice has quite passed out of use, and it constantly happens that ~~the~~ priest, expecting to find a number of communicants ready to receive with him, finds that, by accident, they are not there. I do not mean to deny that there are those who disregard the rubric entirely. The case has not, as your Lordships know, come before me for an opinion. I have not heard it argued. I have no doubt at all that the Church of England does not allow solitary communion by the priest, and wherever I have had an opportunity to know of it I have always interfered to put a stop to it. Whenever I have had occasion to interfere in this way I have always been obeyed hitherto. I think I may fairly ask your Lordships to pause a little in the handling of so serious, delicate, and difficult a matter. The Bishops, I can assure you, are quite in earnest, but they are bound—the Church at large would hold them to be bound, I am quite sure every one of your Lordships on reflection would hold them to be bound—to do their very utmost in the way of conciliation before recourse is had to any legislation on the subject. I, for my part, am quite ready, in my own diocese, to allow of the prosecution of any clergyman who disregards the opinions which I have expressed in reference to the matters which have been argued before me, and let it go to the furthest limit that it can go. But the noble Earl has himself pointed out that it is not the business of the Bishops to prosecute. It is the business of the Bishops to do all they can as Fathers in God to win their clergy over to the path marked out for them by the formularies of the Church. Nor am I prepared to question that, in many cases, those who keep within the formularies of the Church, as interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, still would be held by the great majority of the adherents of the noble Earl as altogether offending against the Church's law. It must not be forgotten that the great question as to the character of the Holy Communion, which was argued in the case of Mr. Bennett, of Frome, was decided in favour of refusing to condemn language of a strong nature which spoke of believing, and teaching others to believe, that the Lord was Himself present in the consecrated elements of the Holy Communion.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: I did not refer to that case. The case I referred to was that of Mr. Ridsdale, tried by Lord Penzance.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I was careful to note that fact. I did not say that the noble Earl referred to that case. I particularly remarked that he did not refer to it, which I thought rather indicated that he was a little afraid of referring to it, because the effect of that case has been really to give the impression that a great deal is authorised in the Church of England which has not been really authorised, although the inference is so exceedingly natural. In that case the Privy Council went to the utmost length of giving liberty to the teaching of doctrine which they themselves acknowledge was not the teaching that was naturally to be drawn from the formularies of the Church, but which they said they could not condemn because the Church had nowhere forbidden the holding or teaching of it. My Lords, I certainly believe that of all things Parliament could do there is hardly anything which would be more disastrous to the Church than to legislate upon the doctrine of the Church, and set aside such a decision as that given by the authority which the noble Earl has again and again declared to be the highest authority for deciding what the doctrine of the Church really is. My Lords, I maintain that whatever we are to do we ought at any rate to take care that we do not narrow the Church of England. She rests upon the right and the duty of private judgment which requires that men shall conscientiously accept her teaching. It is based upon the supposition that men shall think for themselves. You cannot have a Church where the basis is of this character, and, at the same time, say that divergence of opinion is not to be allowed. The one inevitably follows from the other. There must be a wide divergence of opinion if the Church of England is to hold her place. The great decisions in the Gorham case long ago, and in the Bennett case at a later date, marked the character of the supreme tribunal to which these matters have been referred, and in both cases the supreme tribunal has pronounced in favour of the very widest liberty; and to say, after those decisions, that men are not to accept the liberty thus opened before them is altogether inconsistent with the position which any party in the Church of England has a right to claim. I believe that, if you will leave this matter in the hands of the Bishops, in course of time we shall be able so to deal with it as to keep the Church of England one Church, and at the same time quietly to get rid of any of those irregularities of which so much complaint is made. In the decisions I have had to give I do not think anyone can say that there has been any unwillingness on my part to pronounce decidedly where a decided pronouncement seemed to be my duty; nor shall I hesitate if any similar cases come before me. But I am acting under the authority of the Prayer-book, which distinctly imposes upon the Archbishop the duty of deciding on these points of ritual, and, in accordance with that declaration in the Prayer-book, I have undertaken to hear such cases and decide them to the best of my ability. I know the Prayer-book gives me no power to coerce. I know perfectly well that the Prayer-book does not constitute the Archbishop or the two Archbishops a court with power to punish. I know all I can do is simply to declare what, in my opinion, having been entrusted by the Book of Common Prayer with the duty of forming an opinion—what, in my opinion, is within the Church's law or outside it; and you may depend upon it that the Bishops will not shrink from their duty in this matter. The noble Earl complained that I spoke to a deputation that waited upon me as if I had not the power to give directions to clergy outside my own diocese. I did so because it is the law. The clergy outside my diocese are responsible to their own Bishops, and it certainly would not be within the limits of the jurisdiction of an Archbishop to step in between a Bishop and his clergy and to give orders which they are to obey, whether the Bishop required it or not. I have carefully kept within the law. It may be that, in my desire to conciliate, some may think I did wrong. The noble Earl thinks I did wrong in listening to the deputation at all, inasmuch as they used language which, perhaps, was hardly consistent with their position and with my position. But, my Lords, whatever I might think of the language they used, I thought that to receive them and explain to them anything that wanted explaining was part of that conciliation which I believe it to be my duty to practice. I will only add to all this that I am confident that if Parliament will allow us to deal with this matter as Bishops of the Church we shall be able to do so quietly but perhaps not so rapidly as many would desire, all that it is really necessary should be done. With the assurance to your Lordships, I can but hope that the noble Marquess will not hold out anything which will make it more difficult than it is at present to deal with those who are good men, conscientious men, and devoted men, and, although they are mistaken men, yet deserve that kind of handling which ought to be given to men of such high religious character and of such devoted service.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK: My Lords, may I be permitted, as a loyal and obedient son of the Church, who is not a member of any association, union, or league, to say a few words on this question? Last year I took the opportunity of joining in an address to the Bishops begging them to use their fatherly counsel with a view to bringing to an end the difficulties which had arisen in the Church, and I have to thank the two Archbishops for the care, diligence, and skill with which they discharged the duty which the Prayer-book imposes upon them in this connection. No one, I think, can doubt that the conclusions at which they have arrived are correct in accordance with the teaching of the rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer. It is very easy when people are trying patiently to undo a knot, and are doing it with a view to the saving and continuance, so to speak, of the string, to rush in and say—"Take my knife, cut this knot, and bring this thing to an end." We have had experience from the Public Worship Act and from other Acts that you do not so easily and so speedily cut the knot as you suppose. For my part I am quite ready to hand over to the Bishops that for which they are responsible. These societies of which the noble Earl has spoken do not represent the great body of the laity of the Church of England. The Church of England is doing a great work, and a work which no one who is not well acquainted with it can imagine. It was shown in the official year-book of the Church of England that last year over £7,000,000 was raised for the purposes of the Church; and while all this is going on an attempt is being made to prove that there is a great crisis in the Church. The Church Missionary Society has done magnificent work the world over, and one cannot but regret that this debate is taking place at a time when we hear of most inhuman proceedings in China in which missionaries of the Church of England have suffered. I am sure my noble friends who are members of the Roman Catholic Church will not feel that I am saying anything against them or their creed when I say that the religion of the Church of England is, after all, a reformed Catholic religion; and the attempt—if anyone is making the attempt—absolutely to reconcile the two is wholly impossible of success. Although Archbishop Tait was largely instrumental in carrying the Public Worship Act, how did he proceed in his later years? Was he so desirous of rushing into litigation, or of letting those under him rush into litigation? We know that in order to see the work that was being carried on he visited one parish where very extreme views were adopted. He found that the people were calling the priest "Father," and were living in accordance with the principles he had enjoined upon them, and he would not allow a prosecution. Can it be wondered at that when the Bishops see the enormous good that is being done in many of these cases they endeavour to conciliate rather than rush into court? I pray your Lordships not to listen to any idea of bringing about fresh complications by new courts and new proceedings, or of the introduction of Bills which will create confusion, difficulties, and complications, the extent of which it is hardly possible to imagine. Let us leave the matter to those whom we have put in authority. Let us all, and especially the clergy, bind ourselves to submit to the law we have undertaken to support.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I should not have ventured to intervene in this debate if the noble Lord had not put my name in his question. It appears to me that the reference which he has made is one of a very unusual and inconvenient character. The resolution to which he refers was passed by the House of Commons, and he asks us

whether we are going to put it into effect. I have no doubt that the House of Commons will be very much obliged to the noble Earl for the lifting hand which he has given to it, but I think the House of Commons is quite capable of looking after its own affairs. If this resolution is, as he thinks, a pledge for future legislation, he may be quite certain that in that House men will be found who will press that necessity. The resolution is as follows—

"That this House, while not prepared to accept a measure which creates fresh offences and ignores the authority of the Bishops in maintaining discipline in the Church, is of opinion that if the efforts now being made by the Archbishops and Bishops to secure due discipline are not speedily effectual further legislation will be required to obtain the observance of the existing law of the Church and Realm."

I understand the noble Earl to contend that the contingency foreseen by the resolution has occurred, and that the measures of the Archbishops and Bishops to secure the obedience of the clergy are not effectual. It all depends upon the definition of that word "speedily." This resolution was passed in the May of last year. The time has been occupied since then by the Archbishops in determining two or three of the most burning questions which separate members of the Church; and it is physically impossible that the alteration of practices which the authors of this resolution had in view should have taken place at so early a date. I have gladly asked the Archbishop to take the first place in the debate, because I not only demur to the particular form which the noble Earl has selected, but also because I do not admit that the secular and political authority is the kind of authority which deals most fitly with such a matter as this. We have heard the most eloquent and the most instructive language of the most rev. Prelate, and it is upon him that the responsibility falls of inducing his clergy to obey what he conceives to be the law of the Church of England. It is certainly not a matter of political jurisdiction, and I should very much deplore the day on which our separations in political matters should be in any degree reflected in our manner of proceeding in reference to matters of conflict in the Church. I cannot imagine anything that would be more injurious to our politics or more corrupting to our religion. That being the case, how are we to determine the meaning of this word "speedily"? How are we to determine whether the efforts of the Archbishops and Bishops have or have not been effectual during the twelve or thirteen months in which they have been applied? The first consideration that suggests itself to me is that their testimony is a most essential point. Do they tell us that their efforts have not been effectual? You have listened to the most rev. Prelate. He tells you that on the first question raised he has had a large and an increasing measure of success; and he does not doubt that on the other questions, which have been considered at a later date, he shall be quite as successful in his endeavour to induce the clergy to accept his persuasive ruling. It is of no use concealing from yourselves this fact, that either you must provide machinery and agents which can persuade the clergy to obey, or you must undertake the effort of forcing them by all the mechanism that litigation can place at your command. It is needless to point out to you how much bitterness, how much danger to the Church of England any undue encouragement of litigation would cause. But it is not only that. It is an ineffectual process. The noble Earl denounced with great effectiveness the protest made by the English Church Union. I am not here to praise or to blame that utterance. In fact, I am afraid I have not read it. But be it good or be it bad your legislation would be utterly powerless in the matter. Any number of gentlemen may gather together and call themselves the English Church Union, and may pass resolutions on any subject, human or divine, and there is nothing in our law or Constitution to hinder them. So it is with many other matters. I hear a great denunciation of the Confessional—I have expressed my opinion on more than one occasion in this House upon that question—but you cannot stop it by legislation. If A tells his secrets to B, nothing you can put in the Statute-book would give the slightest hope of preventing him from doing it. If you trust to litigation you have a very poor prospect before you. It will lead to a very stormy time. Many evil passions will be aroused; many good works will be stopped, and much combined effort for the advancement of the community in morality and religion will be arrested. If you depend on this litigation, that must be the fate which will meet, and therefore it is that I am in favour not of giving to the adverb "speedily" an interpretation which is absurdly violent, as the noble Earl has done. I should rather strain the matter in the opposite direction, and exercise the utmost possible patience, in order that by persuasion, and by all arts other than those which depend upon litigation, the Bishops might gradually induce those of the clergy who have shown themselves unreasonable and recalcitrant to conform to the general spirit and the general formularies of the Church of England. I have no doubt that they will succeed. On the other hand, I have no doubt that that success will be seriously marred if you attempt by the rough processes of litigation to interfere with their action. It would be undoing their work. But if you accept the belief, which is sustained by all that they tell us of the consequences of the action which they are taking, I think everything in our past history and present experiences points to the fact that we shall reach without danger and without any formidable disturbance a period of calm and progressive utility in the work of the Church of England.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX: My Lords, I have no desire to prolong the discussion, but after what has been said I do not think I ought to be altogether silent. It would be wasting your Lordships' time to comment in any detail on the different statements made by the noble Earl who is responsible for this discussion. It is easy to make such statements if you assume all the questions in dispute. Everyone is agreed that the law ought to be obeyed; the difficulty arises when there is grave doubt what the law is. The noble Earl used at one time to have some acquaintance with one who was then amongst the most distinguished clergymen in the Church of England. No man could insist more strongly than Canon Liddon on the duty of obedience to the legitimate exercise of ecclesiastical authority, but the noble Earl knows, as well as I do, that Canon Liddon, as, indeed, he showed by his own conduct, would have rejected decisively the assumptions and the conclusions founded on those assumptions which make up the greater part of the noble

Earl's speech. It is not difficult to profess an ideal regard for law in the case of others which is by no means so apparent in ourselves. But I think it is always a shock to discover that those who are so rigorous on precept and severe on chastisement are themselves lamentably deficient in practice. I would ask the noble Earl whether it accords with any very genuine regard for law and religion to be associated with robbers of churches, and those who are responsible for the mutilation of the monuments of the dead and the disturbance of divine service. For myself, I think I should distrust a cause which numbers persons of that description amongst its supporters. These, however, are personal matters. The question is, what is the real value of the assertions of lawlessness or disregard of Episcopal authority that have been made in the course of this discussion? Sweeping statements as to general disobedience and lawlessness save a great deal of trouble, but they do not do much to promote an equitable judgment. I would invite your Lordships to come to particulars. As some of your Lordships may, perhaps, be aware, I have recently been engaged in an attempt to get representatives of various opinions in the Church to meet together in order to see if the differences which divide them are really as great as they seem, and whether a great deal might not be done by mutual explanation to mitigate these differences, if not to remove them. I made a similar attempt in 1874, when we had another of these periodical crises in ecclesiastical affairs, which make a stir at the time, but which leave so little trace behind them. It was at the time when the Public Worship Regulation Act was being passed by the somewhat humorous combination, if you come to think of it, of Lord Beaconsfield and Sir William Harcourt, Archbishop Tait and the Earl of Shaftesbury. It was a combination of very distinguished and remarkable men, but it was also one which shows that distinguished and remarkable men may sometimes make mistakes. That Act, like the Bills which have recently emanated from Liverpool, and like the motion of the noble Earl, was ostensibly brought forward only for the purpose of enforcing what was assumed to be the of the Church. It was pointed out that this was by no means a complete account of the measure, that it was in reality a measure directed against the representatives of the entire Oxford Movement, and that if it passed it would either be practically inoperative, or productive of very serious mischief. Those remonstrances were not listened to, the Bill was passed, and the alleged illegalities of Canon Liddon and others were adduced as a reason for declining all the proposals for a conference in the interest of peace and a better understanding. What was the result? Several clergymen were sent to prison—one was shut up in Lancaster Castle for nearly two years—at the instigation not of any aggrieved parishioner, but of outsiders; in one case of outsiders of notoriously bad character. Eventually the very court, disregard of whose decisions had constituted the offence for which these clergymen were imprisoned, discovered that the matters for which they had been sent to prison were almost all of them not offences at all, but matters covered by and in harmony with the directions of the Prayer-book. Is there no lesson very applicable to present circumstances here? Practices which were said to make the Public Worship Regulation Act necessary and a conference impossible have turned out to be justified by the Prayer-book after all. Is it not extremely probable that the practices which the noble Earl alleges as a reason for his motion, and for the agitation which he thinks it his duty to promote, may also eventually be found to be in harmony with the Prayer-book and the teaching of the Church of England? Sir John Kennaway, whom I am proud to call a friend of mine, evidently thinks so, and his opinion is entitled to consideration. Only last year, in a discussion in the House of Commons on this very subject, he pointed out what difficulties the authors of the Liverpool Bills might be preparing for themselves by their proposed legislation. But, my Lords, the noble Earl will perhaps say that he has not been talking about courts, but about Bishops, that it is not disobedience to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that he complains of, but disregard to the injunctions and opinions of the Episcopate. Now, my Lords, whatever may be the force of this appeal in itself, it is one which in the mouth of the noble Earl and his friends is strangely out of place. To begin with it is not to the Bishops as such that the noble Earl and his friends proclaim the duty of obedience. It is to Bishops only so long as they enforce particular decisions of particular courts to whom, according to the noble Earl and his friends, any obedience is due. You have only to read the organs in the Press which support the noble Earl, and the policy which is becoming associated with his name, to see the amount of respect which he and his friends really have for the Episcopate. I was present not long ago at one of those large meetings in the Albert Hall, largely made up of members of different Nonconformist societies, over which the noble Earl is in the habit of presiding, and if I heard a great deal of fault found with myself, I was able to console myself with the reflection that a great deal more fault was found with the bishops. Only last Friday the chief organ of the party represented by the noble Earl, and which always gives every prominence to anything which either he or Mr. Kensit may say or do, stated that no good could be done till Parliament had purged the present Episcopal Bench of half of its present occupants. We have heard of the application of Colonel Pride's purge to the House of Commons. Now it appears we are to have a similar purge, only associated with the noble Earl's name, applied to a section of your Lordships' House. Advocates of such measures can hardly claim to be ardent supporters of the Episcopate, but though I find it impossible to take the noble Earl seriously when he professes a scrupulous regard for Episcopal and Ecclesiastical authority, there are others who have recently been speaking of the obedience due to Bishops whose utterances on the subject of obedience to Episcopal authority are entitled to every respect. For example, the Dean of Windsor, whom to know is to respect, the other day, in his place in Convocation, seemed to proclaim the duty of absolute obedience to the Episcopate under all circumstances and without any qualification. "Those," he said, "who had promised to obey their spiritual rulers could not be absolved from that promise by any view they might take as to what was the Catholic Faith." Now, my Lords, I think statements of this sort require examination. I think their adoption would have landed us in not inconsiderable difficulties in the past, and would land us in no inconsiderable difficulties in the present and future. To begin with, it is quite obvious that if they had been always accepted they would have made the Reformation in England impossible. In the next place, what would they have led to in our own experience? Not a very long ago a Bishop—and a very distinguished Bishop too, both as a scholar and a schoolmaster—threatened to suspend the licence of any curate who preached in a surplice. The Bishop of Winchester the day for sixteen years refused to ordain Mr. Keble's curate for teaching in regard to the Eucharist, what I should doubt if a single Bishop on the bench would venture to dispute now. My Lords, there is no authority in the world, even the most spiritual, which is not limited, and to talk of the absolute duty of obedience to Bishops or to anyone else, without any regard to the nature of the commands given, appears to me to be opposed to all the principles of right reason, sound theology, and altogether contrary to that spirit of rightful liberty and independence which characterises Englishmen. In another communion the assertion is sometimes attempted that no one is to criticise anything any Bishop may say on any question touching faith or morals, but it is a principle I certainly do not wish to see adopted amongst ourselves; and yet, my Lords, we hear things said about Episcopal authority which show that there is some danger of it. Only the other day I was told by a most distinguished member of the London press—a great Radical, by the bye—that the real object of the Bishops' seats in the House of Lords was that they should be able to tell your Lordships what were the moral aspects of such a war as that now being waged in South Africa, and to direct us to right conclusions on the subject. Again, only last week a distinguished member of the Canterbury Convocation declared—I do not remember his exact words, but this was the effect of them—that it was an indecency for a combination of laity and clergy to state in regard to existing controversies what they had always been taught, and what they believe. I can only say that I cannot agree with such opinions. I think the lay members of your Lordships' House are quite as well qualified as the Archbishop of Canterbury himself to judge of the moral aspects of this or any other war, and I also think it a strange way of encouraging an intelligent interest in Church matters amongst the laity, which is said to be so desirable, to tell them that they are on no account to presume to express an opinion as to their faith. Though it is quite true that the Bishops and the synods of the Church are indeed the guardians of the faith and practice of the Church, I do not know that their spiritual office gives them any special qualification for the interpretation of Acts of Parliament, even if those Acts be Acts of uniformity. Upon such subjects we are all entitled to our own opinions. This brings me to the question of the recent declaration on Eucharistic doctrine, which, amongst other things, is, I am aware, responsible for much that has been said to-day. Now, my Lords, that declaration is theologically identical with the statements drawn up by Dr. Pusey for Mr. Bennett when the latter was prosecuted by the party which is represented by the noble Earl who introduced this discussion. As your Lordships are aware, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council did not venture to say that that statement was inconsistent with the formularies of the Church of England. Does the noble Earl accept that decision of the Judicial Committee or does he not? If he does, how does he justify all that he and his friends go about the country saying of the disloyalty and faithlessness to solemn obligations of such as myself and others? If he does not, how does he differ, on his own showing, from those who, like myself, are unable to recognise the competency of a court like the Judicial Committee to declare the doctrine and the ritual of the Church of England? So far as the noble Earl is concerned I might stop here, but I have no wish to shelter myself under any technicalities. The Bishops and the synods are the real guardians of the faith of the Church. Will the Archbishops and the Bishops collectively say that the Declaration, for the issuing of which I am, no doubt, to some extent responsible, is inconsistent with that Catholic belief which we profess every time we recite the Creeds? If they will say so clearly and unmistakably, and with all due formality, they will certainly relieve themselves from any future trouble at the hands of the so-called Ritualists. As far as they are concerned there will then be peace. Whether it will be that sort of peace of which it was said, Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant, I will not stop to inquire. But if the archbishops and bishops decline to make any such statements, if they know, as they do, that such a statement cannot be made, then, my Lords, let us at least hear no more of these charges of disobedience, false doctrine, and disloyalty to the Church that give their only point to the speeches we have heard to-night. There is one other matter in connection with these accusations of lawlessness with which I must trouble your Lordships. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, the other day, compared the conduct of those who thought it their duty to allege an impediment at the solemnisation of the marriage of divorced persons in church with that of those who rendered themselves liable to imprisonment for robbing churches and defacing monuments. I think the noble and learned Lord said that the one class of persons were as much guilty of illegal brawling and indecent conduct as the other. It would be the height of presumption in a layman unlearned in the law to differ on a legal matter with the Lord Chancellor of England, but what is such a layman to do when great legal luminaries themselves disagree? Your Lordships have recently welcomed into this House the very distinguished lawyer who is now Master of the Rolls. Lord Alverstone, when Sir Richard Webster, was formally consulted some time ago on the point in question, and gave his formal opinion—the opinion is dated 27th May, 1895—as follows—

“We are of opinion that it is lawful for any person present in church . . . to allege in response to the invitation of the priest any fact which he . . . believes, and has reasonable ground for believing to be a just cause or impediment to the marriage either by God's law or by the law of the Realm.”

I will say no more on this subject, except that if Lord Alverstone's opinion cannot be contradicted there is all the difference in the world between an act which is not illegal, which is not a statutable offence, and which is provided for by the rubrics, and one which, as the Lord Chancellor told your Lordships the other day, subjects the perpetrators of it to imprisonment for three months. My Lords, I will only say, in conclusion, that the policy advocated by the noble Earl who has provoked the discussion is a policy which, on the showing of those responsible for it, cannot rely on a sufficient support of members of the Church, but has to depend on the support of the Nonconformist bodies who are already making it a condition of their political support that the disestablishment of the Church shall be an open question. It is the policy of a party which seems incapable of ever learning anything by experience, which cannot rise above the most antiquated prejudices and the most illiberal opinions. It is the policy of the party who opposed Roman Catholic emancipation as long as it was possible to do so. It is the policy of those who now are unwilling to do justice to Roman Catholic claims in Ireland in regard to university education, who have always opposed, and who oppose now the repeal of those antiquated and illiberal religious disabilities imposed on the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Lord Chancellor of England, which in the press laments over the number of Roman Catholic officers serving in South Africa, and which the other day ventured to find fault with Her Majesty the Queen for visiting Roman Catholic convents and charitable institutions in Ireland. It is the party whose members in Liverpool are known as those who abuse the Pope and do not go to church. It is the party of religious exclusion and persecution. It is the party which has not the wit to see that religious belief, and the practices which flow from religious belief, can never be put down by coercion, and that as things are, whether we like it or not, the choice lies between a wise and a large toleration, honestly accepted in the hope that at some future time it may lead, as a generous toleration always does, to a greater measure of agreement, or such drastic measures as are either bound to fail, or, if they should succeed, must necessarily destroy the great and unrivalled opportunities for good opening out before the Church of England, and inevitably lead to disruption and disaster.

THE LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER : My Lords, I do not rise to make a speech, nor should I intervene with a single word but for two things ; first, the statement of the Prime Minister that he desired to be guided to some extent by the statistical and other facts which the Bishops could give as to what is being done, and secondly, the fact that the noble Earl, Lord Portsmouth, is a resident in the diocese of Winchester. The significance of the second fact is this: the noble Earl has stated to-night in a positive and sweeping way that the Bishop's efforts, if made at all, have been futile, and (to quote what I think is his phrase) that "things go on exactly as they did before." Now I want to ask the noble Earl, instead of ranging so far afield in his instances, to take simply the diocese to which he belongs, and with which, presumably, he is best acquainted. It is because it is his own diocese that I call his attention to it as an example of what is really happening. Here then are the bare facts. About a year and a half ago sent to every incumbent in the diocese of Winchester—566 in number—a circular letter, specifying certain points—I think they were twelve or thirteen in all—on which difficulty might arise in regard to ritual observance. I asked that where any difficulty was felt in following what seemed to me the law, incumbents should consult me about it without delay. I received 176 replies, and have reason to know that these replies covered all the churches at which such difficulties or doubt did arise. To these I replied severally, stating where in my opinion it was necessary that some change should be effected, and this answer was sufficient to satisfy all but fifteen incumbents. With those fifteen I have since been in communication by correspondence or interviews, and to the best of my belief there is not now a church in the diocese which is defying the authority I have endeavoured to exert. I am not prepared to say that in every church the services are exactly what I desire to see, or, still less, what the noble Earl would desire to see, but what I mean is that there is not, to the best of my belief, at this moment a single incumbent within the diocese who is deliberately disobeying the directions I have given about ritual observance.

MEMBERS OF LOCAL AUTHORITIES RELIEF BILL [H.L.]

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND : My Lords, I told the House on the Second Reading that the Association of Poor Law Unions was in favour of this Bill. Since then I have received a communication from the Association stating that it approves of one of the Amendments of which Lord Harris has given notice.

Therefore, I desire to modify my statement by saying that the Association concurs in the general principle of the measure though not in all its details.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 :—

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): I beg to move an Amendment to leave out the word "private" in Clause 2, for the reason that the term "private soldier" would not include non-commissioned officers.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 2, page 1, line 9, to leave out 'private,' and in line 10, to leave out 'private.'"
—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

Amendment agreed to.

Other Amendments agreed to.

Clause 3 amended and agreed to.

Bill recommitted to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 187.)

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT (1897) EXTENSION BILL.

[THIRD READING.]

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Viscount Cross.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I should like, with your Lordships' permission, to say a very few words before this Bill passes. I quite admit that the Bill is a necessary and natural consequence of the Act of 1897, but I strongly object to the policy of such Bills. The agricultural labourer was left out of the Act of 1897. Of course it would never do to place other workmen under the shelter of the Act and leave agricultural labourers out, especially just before a General Election. That we readily understand. But I contend that, when once you have started on these lines, you cannot possibly stop, and domestic servants even will have to be included. Does anyone believe that you can exclude the cook who burns her fingers or gets scalded in cooking the dinner, or that the housemaid who breaks her ankle can be left out? Of course, this legislation will have to extend to them. That is as certain as is the fact that the sun will rise to-morrow, and if it is not done by my noble friend it will be done by someone on the other side of the House. I saw my doctor this morning, and he appeared to misunderstand the Bill. He thought it was a Bill to include domestic servants, and he said that if that was the case he would never give a vote again for a Conservative; and he added that he would do without domestic servants in future. This sort of legislation, moreover, will tend to reduce wages and employment. In the competition which is going on, every charge which the employer of labour has to bear has to be considered, and, where possible, leads to a reduction of wages. This legislation has already reduced employment. Persons of certain age are not employed now in consequence of liability to accidents. I once had a discussion in this House with reference to a rule adopted at a certain large works to the effect that no man should be engaged over sixty years of age. As a result of this sort of legislation no men are employed, if it can be helped, who have any defect of eye, hand, or limb. Employment is thereby diminished, old people are turned out of work, and wages are reduced. If it is found impossible to reduce wages, then prices will go up. In my opinion there is much that is dangerous in this kind of legislation. If people knew that it tended to lessen wages, I am sure there would not be such a demand for it. I have made inquiries as to how this Bill will affect myself personally. I find that if I insure—a course which everyone who is wise should adopt—the insurance of those employed by me would be between £30 and £40. To some people this is a very large sum, and if it is deducted from the wages of the men it amounts to a reduction of one-fifth of a penny per day. I think it is probable that, as a matter of principle and with the view of bringing home to the men concerned the bearing of this sort of legislation, I shall deduct this amount from the wages. I protest against this sentimental, liberty-interfering-with, and mistaken legislation. My opinion is that the best form of Government would be secured by having a strong Conservative Opposition and a Liberal Government—falsely called liberal, for there is no liberty about them—with a good working majority of one. Then I think we should get on much better, for at the present moment both parties are tobogganing down the Socialistic ladder. When the question is put from the Woolsack I shall say “not content,” for I believe this legislation to be contrary to all the principles which form our nation, and which made the English people a great, a free, and a ruling race.

VISCOUNT CROSS: I do not know that the noble Earl requires an answer from me. He said that the Bill was inevitable, and if it is inevitable it must pass. His principal objection was to something that was not in the Bill—namely, the extension of the Act of 1897 to domestic servants. He said, however, that that would be the next step, but I reply that sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. The noble Earl also said this sort of legislation tended to reduce wages. We have had the Act of 1897 in operation for three years, and we have had no complaint from the workmen that their wages have been lowered. They appear so content with the Act of 1897 that it would be almost cruelty not to extend its provisions to agricultural labourers. I trust your Lordships will recognise that the Act of 1897 has worked well, and will allow this Bill to pass.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 3^d accordingly, with the Amendment, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

COUNTY COURTS (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.].

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE EARL OF DARTREY: I should like to ask the noble and learned Lord in charge of this Bill if it is intended that decrees actually in existence before the passing of this Bill shall be affected by the new arrangements in Clauses 14 and 15.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): Any decrees and orders that are current at the date of the coming into operation of this Bill will come within the remedy that is intended, and the Bill will apply to them.

THE EARL OF MAYO: Does this law exist in England, or is it a new law in Ireland?

LORD ASHBOURNE: I am not well acquainted with the law in England with regard to the renewal of county court decrees, but we are dealing in Clauses 14 and 15 with a rather long and complicated Irish code. The present complicated procedure is swept away under this Bill.

Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported without amendment, and recommitted to the Standing Committee.

VETERINARY SURGEONS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order); Bill reported without amendment; and recommitted to the Standing Committee.

House adjourned at Seven of the Clock, till To-morrow, at Half-past Ten of the clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

DURHAM (COUNTY OF) ELECTRIC POWER SUPPLY BILL. (BY ORDER.)

As amended, considered.

Motion made and Question proposed, “That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.”—(Mr. Caldwell.)

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.): I objected to this motion when it was made on Friday, and the result of my so doing is that the Bill stands now in the position it would have occupied if the motion had not been proposed. I do strongly protest against special facilities being granted to these companies. I do not know why we should be asked to suspend Standing Orders. I cannot understand why the promoters of this Bill should be in such a violent and hysterical hurry to get their Bill through. They have taken up a considerable amount of the time of the Committee, for I believe the Chairman and his colleagues sat nearly nine weeks upon the Bill to consider whether the preamble was proved, and in order to go through the measure line by line. I have seen a large number of statements put forward in support of the Bill containing grossly exaggerated and inaccurate assertions on matters as to which really the decision of the Committee has never been challenged. That decision has been loyally accepted by those concerned. I can only add that in another place individual towns will renew their opposition, and, therefore, under the circumstances, I do not intend to press my objection to a division.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL (Hertfordshire) said that on behalf of Hertfordshire he wished to join in the protest made by his hon. friend against the suspension of the Standing Orders in connection with similar Bills to this one.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SOUTH WALES ELECTRICAL POWER DISTRIBUTION BILL. (BY ORDER.)

As amended, considered.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff) stated that he withdrew his opposition to this Bill, as the representatives of the populations concerned had been met, and a perfectly satisfactory agreement come to.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Bill accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EDUCATION BOARD PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION (LONDON) BILL [Lords].

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [10th July], "That the Education Board Provisional Order Confirmation (London) Bill [Lords] be committed to a Select Committee."—(Lord Hugh Cecil.)

Question again proposed—Debate resumed.

LORD HUGH CECIL (Greenwich) said his motion was that this Bill be sent to a Select Committee. The House would be aware that under the ordinary procedure of Provisional Orders there was no possibility of inquiry into the merits of the question involved. The matter, unless petitioned against, went before the Unopposed Bills Committee, and the Order usually came back without Amendment. There was really no inquiry into the merits, nor could there be any inquiry into what were ordinarily considered to be the merits of the Bill, because the petitioners only had a locus standi if they were concerned in some injury to private property. Last year a Voluntary school, which thought it would be injured by one of the sites proposed to be established under a similar Bill, petitioned against it, and, after a hearing before the Referee, it was determined that it had no locus standi, because it had no property interested in the matter, and there could consequently be no inquiry into the merits of the Bill. Now, the motion he was making would enable the Committee to go into the economic administration of the School Board, and into the question of the necessity of the sites. It was quite possible that a perfect explanation might be forthcoming on those points if his motion were carried, but unless it was agreed to the matter could not be gone into. It was necessary to say that the School Board had adopted a different procedure for the purpose of arriving at the "places" in a school to that adopted by the Board of Education. The Board of Education considered that eight square feet was sufficient accommodation for a child, but the School Board took a higher standard, and said that they would only recognise eleven square feet as sufficient accommodation for a child, so that by a stroke of the pen the space in the schools had been reduced by 30,000 places. In order to cope with that they would have to build thirty schools, each to accommodate 1,000 children, and incur an expenditure of £300,000, because they went beyond what the Education Department considered necessary.

He never contemplated the proceedings of the London School Board without being astonished at their amazing impudence in the way they overruled the decisions of the Department of Education, which they did in a manner certainly not contemplated by the Act. The Vice-President of the Education Department had informed him, in answer to a question, that at the present moment there were being recognised by the Education Department 798,000 school places which actually existed, and 28,000 projected places in schools in course of erection. In addition to that there were sixteen unused sites which the School Board had acquired under compulsory powers and never used, which were kept in reserve for no apparent reason. There was a certain discrepancy between the figures supplied by the Education Department and those furnished by the Report of about 55,000. The School Board had sixteen sites in reserve, and now they came forward for compulsory powers to acquire thirty more sites. Chief Inspector King had called attention to the decreasing number of children between the ages of three and thirteen years attending the schools, and according to the School Board's own reports there had been a diminution in the years 1897, 1898, and 1899 of no less than 8,000. Yet, with this diminishing child population, and with all these places, the School Board proposed to acquire thirty more sites. It was a case for inquiry. They might be necessary, but that would have to be shown. The only reason which could be urged was that the number of children had not decreased really, but had removed to other districts; but if that were so, it was obvious that several City sites, which had been useful, had become useless, and the House ought to be assured that in that case the School Board had made proper provision for the sale of those sites and devoting the money realised to giving the new educational facilities that were necessary. Mr. John Taylor, who had devoted a great deal of time and trouble to investigating the question of sites, pointed out that the Religious Educational Union had successfully opposed the applications of the School Board on various occasions with regard to sites, and had in some cases caused them to be rejected. They further called attention to the extraordinary extravagance with which the matter of sites was carried out. The House was aware the School Board proceeded with dividing London into blocks, and in each block they built a school. Then, if there was insufficiency of accommodation in the school, they applied for power to increase the accommodation. Such a test was unfair. The Education Department should first of all endeavour to find out what proportion of the population desired to go to the schools; then they should take a map of London and measure it off into districts with a compass, and then draw circles over the map showing the radius of each school. If that were done it would be found that the School Board had over-estimated the amount of school accommodation demanded to an almost ludicrous degree. If the Bill was sent to a Select Committee there could not fail to be an interesting investigation. It might be that these schools were required, but the School Board was often very extravagant in these matters. London had not complete control over its representatives in this matter, and it was in the highest degree important that London should be well governed locally, and if it could be shown that the School Board did its work extravagantly a considerable service would be done to the country.

MR. FLOWER (Bradford, W.): In supporting this resolution I propose to take a somewhat different view to the noble Lord who moved. I quite agree with a great deal that has fallen from the noble Lord, but when one remembers that London has 450 schools with an average attendance of half a million children, it will be acknowledged that the problem is one which may fittingly require the very careful consideration of this House. The noble Lord has spoken of the discrepancy between the figures, which may be described as the Return of the School Board, and those supplied by the Education Department. That is undoubtedly proved; and that discrepancy has been caused by the action which the London School Board has taken in what is called writing down the accommodation. With regard to new schools, I think that no one interested in education will object to it, but it is with regard to the older schools that this difficulty has more acutely arisen—more especially with regard to the competition with Voluntary schools, which has brought about an apparent deficiency of school accommodation in the area covered by the London School Board. Whereas, if it was reckoned on the basis of the accommodation long ago accepted by the Education Department, that deficiency would not exist. I also support this motion on another ground. School boards do not acquire sites in the same way as a railway company or public bodies of that kind. What a school board does is to present to the Education Department generally two or three sites as alternatives. These sites are considered by the Department, and Her Majesty's inspector is sent down by the Department to see into the fitness of the alternatives and to report as to the suitability of one or the other. He is not, I think, authorised or allowed to hold what is called a public inquiry, but I believe that those bodies or individuals who object to particular sites have an opportunity of presenting their views before him. Then the Education Department, or the Board of Education, as it is now called, has to express approval or disapproval of a site, and, if they approve, that site is inserted in the Provisional Order Bill. It is obvious that the cost of opposing the Order Bill in Committee is a very considerable one, and it does seem to me that a somewhat cheaper and more expeditious machinery ought to be devised, by which those who may think themselves injured, either as individuals by reason of their property, or injured as regards the position of the school affecting some Voluntary denominational school in which they are particularly interested, should have an easier, quicker, and cheaper method of placing their views before us. The noble Lord the Member for Greenwich has spoken of those sites which have been "reserved," as it is called, for possible sites for the erection of Board schools which are not now used. He suggested that the School Board for London should sell these sites, but if they did sell them it would be at a very considerable loss. Those sites are the result of reckless scheduling, and unless you can devise some machinery by which this reckless scheduling of sites may be avoided in future, you will be continuously confronted with the same thing. He has spoken also of the migratory character of the London population. That is undoubtedly true. Schools which were erected a few years ago have now been found, if not superfluous, at all events too large for the purpose for which they are intended. I am afraid that it is an evil that will and must continue; but what is possible, I think, is to prevent reckless choosing of sites—choosing them sometimes almost without any regard for the deficiency of school places in the neighbourhood, but with a desire to injure and cripple the work of some Voluntary school. They are sites chosen, not from educational but from sectarian motives. Let us hope that this proposal of my noble friend will prevent the recrudescence of this evil, which under the present Board has assumed gigantic dimensions. I have pleasure in supporting the motion.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): I wish to let the House know how this Bill stands. The School Boards must have sites, or they cannot carry on their schools. The acquisition of sites is regulated by Acts of Parliament, and what I understand the noble Lord to desire is a revision of the various Acts which regulate the acquisition of sites by School Boards. To that the Board of Education could have no objection whatever, but I think it is better to initiate such an inquiry at the beginning rather than at the end of the session. If we were to refer this Bill to a Select Committee now, at any rate, we would lose the Bill for this session, because it is quite impossible to get hon. Members to attend a Select Committee, and to report upon a matter of this kind before the end of the session. Therefore what I would suggest to my noble friend is to withdraw the motion to-day, and in the next session he should move for an inquiry of this kind, and, as far as I am concerned and the Board of Education is concerned, we will throw no impediment in the way whatever, and if the Committee should report in favour of a change in the law we will give every facility to let a Bill pass through Parliament. I do not say that the law as it at present stands might not be improved. I do not know that there are any laws in existence which are not capable of some amendment, but a matter of this kind is not carried out quite as rapidly as the noble Lord supposes. The Board of Education is entrusted with a very important duty, and that is not to allow school boards in any place—not only in London, but in every other part of the country—to build a new school until the necessity for it is made out, and for that purpose inquiry is always made before the sanction of the Education Department is given to the building of a new school. London is a very difficult place to deal with in matters of that kind. As the noble Lord has pointed out, there is no doubt that under the present system in London there are far more than enough school places for the children to be accommodated, but London unfortunately is a very large place, with a shifting population, and it is no use whatever if there is a deficiency of accommodation in Battersea to say that there is more than enough in Whitechapel. Generally speaking, it may be said that the population of London is diminishing with some rapidity at the centre; but on the other hand it is growing with enormous rapidity in Battersea, Hackney, and Peckham, and indeed all the parts which surround London. These are the places where workmen are going, and provision has to be made for the education of their children. The Board of Education have considered this difficult matter, and what it does is to divide London proper into blocks. For example, one of the blocks is bounded by Oxford Street and High Holborn on the north, Farringdon Street on the east, Fleet Street and the Strand on the south, and Charing Cross Road on the west. There is another block even more familiar to Members of the House bounded by Oxford Street on the north, Piccadilly on the south, Regent Street on the East, and Park Lane on the west. In the same way the whole of London is divided into blocks of this kind. What the London School Board does is to make out a petition stating that in one of these blocks it can prove that there is not sufficient accommodation for primary education of the children, and that there is a case for building, but even then further inquiry is made. Having ascertained that there is a deficiency in one block, inquiry is made how far it can be made up from superfluous accommodation in an adjoining block. I think it will be quite obvious to the House that it would be a very foolish thing for children south of Oxford Street to go for accommodation to schools north of Oxford Street. Nobody would say that it is desirable for children to traverse that great thoroughfare when going to school; but in places where there is only a moderate amount of traffic on the boundary children may be allowed to go from one block, where there is deficient accommodation, to another block where there is superfluous accommodation. These inquiries are made before a new site is scheduled in a Bill, and no action is taken until the Board of Education has arrived at a satisfactory conclusion in the matter. It has to be fairly made out that there are children without school accommodation, and that no accommodation can be provided for them in the block in which they live, or in an adjoining block. I think to ask the House of Commons at the very end of a session to stop a Bill which is being carried out in accordance with the law, and entirely in accordance with unbroken custom, for the purpose of beginning what could only be an abortive inquiry, would be rather a strong thing for the noble Lord to insist upon. I hope this Bill will go in the ordinary way to the Private Bill Committee, before whom the people who object to two of the sites can be heard. The Private Bill Committee will inquire whether the Board of Education has been justified in authorising any site at all. I can promise the noble Lord that in the next session of Parliament I, at all events, will be only too glad to assist him in having the whole system of the legal provision of school sites inquired into, and if there is any way in which it can be better carried out, I hope the Committee will report to Parliament what they think should be done.

LORD HUGH CECIL: I understand that the Government are prepared to promise that there will be a full inquiry if I ask it at the beginning of next session. That is an exceedingly valuable concession which I asked in vain four years ago. I think, therefore, it will be unnecessary to press this motion.

SIR J. GORST: I have no authority on behalf of the Government to make such a promise. All I said was that I would assist the noble Lord if he asked for an inquiry next session.

LORD HUGH CECIL: I understood that my right hon. friend spoke on behalf of the Board of Education, which represents the Government in this matter, and

, but the Vestry of St. George-the-yr, the local authority of the ict, altogether object to the suggested, and desire the scheme tand over for further considera-
. The objections I wish to enforce ne scheme are these: no further nmodation for additional children is red; the school is large enough to nmodate the children of the par-ar locality. It is a badly situated l, being under a railway arch, and fore very noisy. In any case the proposed to be taken is the wrong

It is proposed to secure an area of 70 square feet, to pull down seven-houses, to dishouse 230 persons ging to the labouring classes in a bourhood where there is a great nd for workmen's dwellings, and r the existing law no provision will to be made for rehousing those
e. If twenty houses had been taken r the existing law it would have been utely necessary to provide accommo-n for the whole of the dispossessed ants, but as only seventeen houses ken that necessity is avoided. I ot saying that in the part of London

I represent further school accommodation is not necessary; but if such further accommodation is necessary, it is not necessary to have it in this particular school. At the present moment 200 or 300 children are located in a temporary school some distance from this one, and the Vestry of St. George-the Martyr say that if it is necessary to have further accommodation, it should be in a new school on a different site, and on a site to which only two or three years ago the Board were giving consideration. The houses which are being taken down contain at present 230 persons; they are very substantially and well built; the rents are satisfactory; the sanitary arrangements are good; and the inhabitants would have very great difficulty in finding any similar suitable accommodation in the district. I am asked that this scheme should stand over until next year, and I may be asked if I have any alternative plan to suggest if that course is adopted. I have. The area now proposed to be taken covers nearly 15,400, and has a rateable value of £387. There is an adjoining piece of land which comes into the Borough Road, having upon it five shops in the Borough Road and a house and yard in Belvedere Place, and a tram shed, the area of which is 13,750 square feet, with a rateable value of only £278. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President has said that this Bill is going to a Committee of the House as there is opposition to it. Only one petition has been presented against the Bill, and that is the petition of the Vestry of St. George-the-Martyr. The Bill therefore, will go through as unopposed if the House will agree that this plan should be withdrawn for the present year. The managers of the school are all favourable to the alternative site, while, at the worst, it would only mean the deferring of the alternative for a year, and in the meantime I am sure the School Board and the Education Department would come to the conclusion that the alternative site is really the better.
My plan is a very simple, just, and common-sense plan. This is not a party question, and therefore I may appeal to hon. Members on the other side, as well as to those on this, to support my motion.
I beg to move.

LORD HUGH CECIL formally seconded
the motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Education Board Provisional Order Confirmation (London) Bill [Lords] to leave out Plan No. 41 in the Schedule."—(Mr. Causton.)

MR. FLOWER said that the speech of the mover of the motion had very aptly illustrated the value of the discussion on the motion of the noble Lord the hon. Member for Greenwich. It was quite impossible for the House as a House to determine the merits of the respective sites. It was beyond the comprehension even of Members acquainted with the district, and it was obviously altogether outside the limits of fair play for the hon. Gentleman to attempt at the eleventh hour to get a particular site adopted. The mover of the motion had secured the valuable support of the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich, and he trusted those Gentlemen would mutually support an improved process in the future for dealing with these questions. This site should be considered by a Committee in the ordinary way. As to the necessity for school accommodation, about which the hon. Member for West Southwark spoke with some diffidence, Her Majesty's Inspector, so far back as March, 1896, was disposed to think the best course would be enlargement of the Belvedere Place School in accordance with the proposal of the divisional Member, the divisional Member being the member of the London School Board for that part of London. The inspector also suggested certain improvements and amendments, which were provided for in the plan now proposed. An alternative site was very carefully considered, and rejected by both the divisional Member and the School Accommodation Committee of the London School Board. The hon. Member had endeavoured to enlist sympathy on that side of the House by stating that the scheme would dispossess 230 persons, and that the School Board would be under no statutory obligation to re-house. But as a result of a decision of last year, it would be open to the Committee to insist upon the rehousing of the dispossessed persons, even though less than twenty houses were taken. There were many points in connection with the site to which reference might be made, but the House could rest satisfied that the matter had engaged the careful attention of the School Board, and having received the approval of the Board of Education, it might fittingly be allowed to pass.

SIR J. GORST, in opposing the motion, said the case of St. George the Martyr had already been heard by the Board of Education. The Vestry were not satisfied with the decision, and petitioned the House of Lords, but with no better success.

MR. CAUSTON pointed out that when the Vestry went before the House of Lords they were told they had no locus standi as a vestry, but they could be heard as owners of property.

MR. J. GORST said that, in whatever capacity they appeared, they were, as a matter of fact, heard, and the House of Lords decided that no case was made out for the alteration of the site. If any injustice were done when the matter went before the Committee, the hon. Member would have an opportunity on consideration for bringing the matter forward, and he therefore hoped the motion would be rejected.

*MR. CAUSTON: I only wish it to be made perfectly clear that we have a locus standi before the Committee of this House. Certainly we had no locus standi in the House of Lords. In the case referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, the learned counsel was under a misapprehension when he informed the Committee of the House of Lords that there had been a local inquiry, because there has not been a local inquiry. I shall divide the House now and take my chance in Committee.

Question put and negatived.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS—REPORTED GENERAL MASSACRE OF EUROPEANS IN PEKING—POSITION AT TIENSIN AND TA-KU.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask whether the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has any information to communicate on the subject of China; and not only as to events there, but as to the course which the Government proposes to take in regard to them.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Although no positive information has reached us of the terrible calamity of which details have appeared in the public press this morning, we can hardly, I fear, dare to hope that in substance the accounts of the massacres in Peking are erroneous. Consul General Warren at Shanghai telegraphed yesterday evening that he learnt from a well-informed Chinese source that cannon were believed to have been fired on the Legations on the 8th of July, a massacre ensuing, the object being to effect an irreparable breach with foreigners. Official confirmation of this report was wanting, but Her Majesty's Consul General feared it to be true. The following telegrams have been received from Brigadier General Dorward, in command of Her Majesty's military forces at Tientsin—

"Tientsin, 10th July.—Yesterday, 3 a.m., combined force 1,000 Japanese under the command of General Fokosima, 550 British troops, 400 British navy, 100 United States, 400 Russians under command of myself attacked enemy's position south-west of city. Positions were quickly captured. Enemy's loss 350 killed, four small guns (? captured). Combined force then attacked Western Arsenal outside South Gate, which, after a short bombardment, was rushed by United States and Japanese. Country to the west of Arsenal had been flooded by enemy, so no further movement in this direction was possible. Chief object of expedition, which was to clear away guns and enemy to the west of settlements, completely carried out. Day's honours rested with Japanese and Americans; Chinese regiment as escort to guns worked splendidly, getting over difficulties of swampy country. During the action British and French settlements heavily shelled by north-eastern batteries. Following casualties reported in action:—2nd Royal Welsh Fusiliers, 3644 Private Porter; Royal Marine Light Infantry, one private; one Chinese hospital attendant killed in action. Lieutenant Phayre, R.A., three men, 2nd Royal Welsh Fusiliers, one seaman, one man Chinese regiment, one Chinese hospital attendant wounded. No casualties amongst Russians and Americans. Following casualties reported during bombardment:—2nd Royal Welsh Fusiliers, 4034 Private Porter, one seaman killed in action. Three men, one seaman wounded. Yesterday's victory may result in withdrawal of Chinese troops from Tientsin, in which case fort and city will probably be attacked soon."

The following telegram shows that that opinion, however, was not justified :—

"Tientsin, 11th July.—Three o'clock this morning, determined attack made by enemy on railway station, which is garrisoned by 100 British troops, 100 French, 100 Japanese. Attack repulsed with loss after four hours hard fighting; enemy's loss 500 killed; our loss, Hong Kong Regiment, 3 men killed 9 wounded; 2nd Battalion Welsh Fusiliers, 1 wounded; Royal Marine Light Infantry, 3 wounded; Royal Navy, 3 wounded. French and Japanese losses considerably heavier."

We have also had a telegram to the effect that Vice-Admiral Seymour has returned to his ship, leaving at Tientsin only a sufficient number of the Naval Brigade to work the guns there. In a telegram, dated Ta-ku, 14th July, the Admiral states that he believes the allied forces have taken possession of every fort at Tientsin except one. It may be interesting to the House to know what forces are at Ta-ku. According to a telegram from Rear-Admiral Bruce at Ta-ku, dated 11th July, the total of the allied forces landed and landing on the 10th July was about 20,700 men, composed as follows :—

		Officers.	Men.
Russia	...	149	8,200
Japan	...	124	5,100
British	...	175	2,400
French	...	103	2,400
German	...	36	1,087
American	...	10	1,305
Italian	} Small detachments.
Austrian

Thus there are 604 officers and 20,700 men. The House is probably aware that considerable forces are now landed or are on their way, but the facilities for landing at Ta-ku are limited, and therefore the reinforcements cannot be landed as quickly as they arrive. I do not think I have any further information to give the House.

MEASURES TAKEN FOR SAFETY OF PEKING LEGATIONS.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information to the effect of the statement made by Count von Bülow, German Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in his circular note, that up to 10th June the English Minister at Peking, in agreement with the late Baron von Ketteler, considered the personal safety of members of the Legations had been sufficiently secured by the measures already adopted; and can he state on what date Admiral Seymour was summoned to commence his march to Peking.

*MR. BRODRICK: Guards for the Legations were sent for on 27th May, and although the position was not free from anxiety, the first intimation of imminent danger to the Legations is contained in a telegram from Sir C. MacDonald of 4th June. He stated that the position was such that they might be besieged at any time with the railway and telegraph line cut, and he asked that, should this happen, instructions might be sent to Admiral Seymour to concert measures for their relief with the officers commanding the various squadrons at Ta-ku. Her Majesty's Government gave Admiral Seymour unfettered discretion on 6th June to act in concert with other Powers, and he landed a force on 9th June. On 10th June, Sir C. MacDonald telegraphed to Admiral Seymour urging an immediate advance which had been in fact already commenced.

MR. MACLEAN: Is there anything definite from Sir C. MacDonald up to 10th June as to the safety of the Legations?

COMMUNICATIONS WITH THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the despatch which has reached Her Majesty's Government purporting to come from the Emperor of China was handed to the Government by the Chinese Ambassador in the ordinary course; and when the Government will communicate the contents of that despatch to the House of Commons.

*MR. BRODRICK: The despatch was received from the Chinese Minister in the ordinary course. It will be laid with the Papers.

COMMAND OF ALLIED FORCES.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any General in supreme command of the allied forces at Tientsin; and, if not, whether any communications have passed between the Powers as to the appointment of a Commander-in-Chief.

MR. BRODRICK: The instructions given by Her Majesty's Government to the senior naval and military officers on the spot are to arrange all matters in concert with the commanding officers of the forces of other Powers. Communications are passing between the Powers on various points, but we are not in telegraphic communication with Tientsin, and cannot make any further statement at present.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government has sanctioned any proposal to put the allied forces at Tientsin under the command of a Japanese general officer.

MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir; nor has any such proposal yet been made.

CHINA PAPERS.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state when the China Papers will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. BRODRICK: They are being prepared as quickly as possible, but I cannot name any day at present. They will be laid in time for discussion before the Foreign Office Vote is taken.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the criticism to which the appointment of Professor Cunningham to be a member of the South African Hospitals Commission has been subject, he will now state to the House the grounds on which Professor Cunningham was recommended for the appointment by Sir William MacCormac and by Dr. Jameson, the head of the Army Medical Department, whose administration in South Africa will be the subject of investigation.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have nothing to add to what I have already told the hon. Gentleman on this subject; but I do not admit the basis of fact which he has assumed in putting the question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Pardon me, it is no assumption.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): Can the right hon. Gentleman announce the names of the two additional members of the Commission?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am very sorry that so much delay has occurred. No one deplores it more than I do; but I hope to be able to make a statement to-morrow.

DESPATCHES.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now prepared to state when the despatches relating to the following operations in South Africa will be published, namely, the action at Paardeberg, the advance to Bloemfontein, the siege and relief of Ladysmith, and the further operations in Cape Colony and Natal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As, I think, I indicated, there are difficulties in the way of publishing these despatches at present, but I hope that the delay will not be very long.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: Before the Supplementary Estimate comes on?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe not.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: When they are published, will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that they shall be published as written, and shall not be re-edited as the Magersfontein despatch was?

TRANSPORT RETURN.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, having regard to the fact that the Transport Return (South Africa) was ordered on 6th February last, presented on 21st May, and ordered to be printed on 22nd May, will he explain why its issue to Members is so long delayed.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): I regret that there has been any delay in the production of this voluminous Return, involving the accurate checking of many details. The Return is now complete and will be in the hands of Members in a few days.

MINISTERIAL CRISIS IN CAPE COLONY.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, having regard to the importance of the subject, and especially to the varying accounts thereof, he will now lay before Parliament Papers explaining the recent Ministerial crisis in Cape Colony, including any communications which have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Cape Colony.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Yes, Sir.

MARTIAL LAW—ARREST OF MR. JACOBUS BOTHA.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): On behalf of the hon. Baronet the Member for the North-wich Division of Cheshire, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Mr. Jacobus Botha, a Member of the Cape Parliament, was arrested at Cape Town on 26th June without a warrant; and, if so, by whose authority the arrest was made; whether an application was made by him, and to what court, for his unconditional release from arrest, and whether that application was refused; whether he has been admitted to bail only on condition of taking his trial at Aliwal North; whether Aliwal North is one of the districts where martial law was in force; and whether he is to be tried by a court martial or by what tribunal.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am informed by Sir A. Milner as follows (in reply to a telegraphic inquiry): Botha was arrested for high treason at Cape Town on date mentioned, on warrant signed by resident magistrate Aliwal North. He applied unsuccessfully to magistrate Cape Town, and subsequently to Supreme Court, for release from arrest, but was afterwards admitted to bail by the latter on condition that he should return to Aliwal North and remain there during his preparatory examination, which is now being held there by civil authorities. Case will probably come for trial in due course before Special Commission. Aliwal North is a district under martial law.

MARTIAL LAW IN CAPE COLONY.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, since what date, in the districts of Cape Colony where martial law was proclaimed, have the military courts ceased to take cognizance of offences, other than those committed by soldiers, against the Criminal Law of the Colony.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I understand that since the middle of April no fresh trials for treasonable offences by the military courts have taken place—only preliminary investigations. This is all the information I have.

COURT MARTIAL PUNISHMENTS.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether persons sentenced by courts martial in the Cape Colony to terms of imprisonment or penal servitude are detained in civil or in military prisons; and, if they are detained in civil prisons, whether the warrants are signed by civil or by military officers.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have no information. The question should be addressed to the War Office.

CIVIL SURGEONS AT THE FRONT.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state the number of civil surgeons whose services have been accepted since the outbreak of hostilities in South Africa for the field hospitals and base hospitals, and the number of civil surgeons who are at present employed in these hospitals, and how many Army medical officers within two years from their entrance into the Army Medical Service have been sent to the war in South Africa; whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that of ninety-eight Army medical officers who are liable to be recalled to service, four only are employed in South Africa or in hospital ships, and that although many of them have requested to be sent to the seat of war their offers were refused; whether the authorities at the War Office are aware that the sending of Army medical officers without previous experience in campaigns, and the recognition of the services of civil surgeons while the services of retired Army medical officers have been rejected, has led to discontent and a feeling that the medical treatment of the troops will be wholly subordinate to purely military considerations; and will he cause inquiries to be made in the matter.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The services of 385 civil surgeons have been accepted, principally for base hospitals and general duty; of these 363 are now in South Africa. This does not include those locally employed, or attached to private hospitals or to the Yeomanry or the Rhodesian Field Force. One hundred and seventeen Royal Army Medical Corps officers under two years' service have been sent out. Of the ninety-eight officers liable to recall, as has been already stated, eighteen hold permanent military appointments at home, and very few volunteered for service in South Africa. Nothing is known of any general discontent to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

FEVER AT LADYSMITH.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to the statement that there have been 6,000 cases of typhoid fever among the troops at Ladysmith since the relief of that place; and if he can give the number of admissions to hospital for typhoid fever, and the number of deaths from that disease in the forces under General Buller for the twelve weeks ending 25th May.

MR. WYNDHAM: I have no knowledge of the statement put forward, and I have complete Returns for the Ladysmith garrison only up to 18th May. The cases of enteric at Ladysmith from the date of the relief to the week ending 18th May amount to 799. Including the above the total admissions for all the forces in Natal during the twelve weeks ending 25th May were 2,380, and the deaths 550.

TREATMENT OF DISCHARGED SOLDIERS—CASE OF ROBERT WEIR.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state on what grounds has the conclusion been formed that the mental infirmity of private Robert Weir, of the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers, who, on his return from the war in South Africa, was transferred from Netley to the workhouse at Enniskillen, where he is now a pauper inmate, was not due to the horrors and privations of the campaign in Natal through which he served with his regiment; and, seeing that Weir would be entitled to a pension if his mental infirmity was due to his services in the Army, can he say by whom was the judgment formed that his madness was not directly or indirectly caused by these services, and to what supervision or control was that judgment subject.

MR. WYNDHAM: This man became insane on the passage out, and twice tried to jump overboard; he was disembarked at Cape Town, and kept under supervision there for two months, and was then invalided home. Upon these facts the medical officer in charge of the hospital at Cape Town formed the opinion that Weir's madness was not the result of the campaign in Natal; that opinion was confirmed by several medical officers through whose hands the man passed, and finally by the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital.

CASUALTY RETURNS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what explanation, if any, has the War Office to give for the circumstances that the death of Sergeant G. French, of the Royal Warwick Regiment, which occurred at Bloemfontein on 26th May, and the death in the same place of Private Martin, of the same regiment, on 31st May, were not published by the War Office till 12th July; and can he say why have the families of these two soldiers, who died presumably in hospital at Pretoria, not been apprised of their deaths for nearly two months.

MR. WYNDHAM: The information was not received by the War Office until Sunday, the 8th July, and after the usual verification was published on the 10th July.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Has the hon. Gentleman any reason to give for the long delay?

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member must be aware that it is only by means of a very elaborate system of triplicate returns that we are able to get the information we do at such an early date.

IRISH MILITIAMEN AND THE HARVEST.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the inconvenience and loss that may result to Ireland by having the Irish Militia Regiments in England while their labour is needed during the harvest in Ireland, he will consider the desirability of either disbanding them or giving them leave to return to Ireland to assist at the harvesting.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Instructions were issued on the 6th June to the general officers commanding in the United Kingdom that militiamen belonging to units embodied before the 6th March might be given furlough if they had satisfactorily completed their training and could be spared. The Secretary of State would have been glad to assent to a more general release of the Militia, both in the interests of the men themselves and in view of the widespread demand for labour, but, having regard to present circumstances, he has come to the conclusion that general leave or disembodiment would be inexpedient.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL GARDEN.

MR. MASSEY-MAINWARING (Finsbury, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state by whose orders the garden of the Chelsea pensioners was lately closed at 8 p.m. instead of 9 p.m.; by whose orders this garden has been closed at 8.30 p.m. this week; and why the hour fixed for closing between the 10th June and 10th July, which has existed for many years, was altered, and at whose suggestion.

MR. WYNDHAM: The gardens were closed at an earlier hour than usual by orders of the Lieutenant Governor and Secretary of the hospital to prevent disorderly conduct which, it appears, had been taking place in the dusk.

ARMY LANCES—SERGEANT CARTWRIGHT'S CLAIM.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether his attention has been called to an application from Sergeant Cartwright, late of the 16th Lancers, for some monetary recognition for his services in connection with his exhibition with the lance before a committee of generals; and whether, considering the fact that he was informed that upon his performance depended the retention of the lance in the Army, and taking into account the fact that Sergeant Cartwright was promised a commission, he will consider whether it would be possible to accede to his request and make an allowance to him for the services rendered.

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): There are no records in the War Office showing that any promise of a commission was made to Sergeant Cartwright or which corroborate other statements made in the question. The Secretary of State for War has fully considered Sergeant Cartwright's application, and is not prepared to grant it.

NAVAL CONSTRUCTION—INFLAMMABLE WOODWORK.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that as a result of the experience gained in the war between China and Japan, and in the war between the United States and Spain, the woodwork in all men-of-war lately built and now building for the United States Government is made of non-flammable timber; whether he is also aware that the Russian Government are having men-of-war built in the United States in which all the woodwork is non-flammable; and can he say whether the wood used in vessels at present under construction for the British Government is rendered non-flammable.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The term "lately built" is indefinite. The woodwork for all men-of-war building for the United States Government will be non-flammable, armour backing and battens for electric wires excepted. Two ships are building for Russia in the United States. We have no special information on this point relative to these ships, but in all Russian ships now building orders have been given to use non-flammable wood for certain purposes. Wood not specially treated is to be still largely used. The use of non-flammable wood has been provided for in the specifications for several ships now under construction, but it has since been found to involve certain serious disadvantages, and further orders have been suspended until the best way of overcoming these difficulties has been ascertained by further experience.

AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH — BEST GOVERNOR GENERAL — OFFICIAL RESIDENCE.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies when the nomination of the first Governor General of the Australian Commonwealth may be expected, and whether the official residence of the Governor General is to be located at Sydney pending the establishment of the permanent Federal capital.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member will have seen from the announcement in the press on the 14th instant that Her Majesty has approved the selection of the Earl of Hopetoun as the first Governor General. The question of the Governor General's residence is the subject of communications now passing with the Colonies.

INDIAN AND AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, owing to the under-staffing and various other causes, considerable quantities of Indian and Australian mails have recently failed to catch the steamers for which they were intended.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): On several recent occasions it has not been practicable to include all the printed matter for India and Australia in the mails for which it was intended; but no letters have on any occasion been left behind. Several causes have contributed to the delay. The public have the habit of leaving the posting of their Indian and Australian correspondence to the very last moment—that is to say, till Friday evening; and the work has been enormously increased of late on that evening by the large number of letters and newspapers posted for the troops in South Africa. Further, there has not been room at the General Post Office for an adequate staff of men to deal with the outgoing foreign mails. Now that the provincial work of the United Kingdom has been removed to Mount Pleasant, steps are being taken to increase the staff at the General Post Office, and it is hoped that by this means the irregularity to which the Hon. Member refers will be remedied. This end, however, would still be the more easily attained if the public would post as much of their Indian and Australian correspondence as possible earlier in the week.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Continental railways that carry the Australian mails are liable to any penalty for needless delays caused by carelessness and inefficiency in their working arrangements; and, if not, whether the propriety of inserting such a provision in future contracts will be taken into consideration.

MR. HANBURY: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the Australian mails landed at Naples. The Postmaster General has no relations with the Italian and French railway companies which convey those mails; and he has no information as to the arrangements existing between them and their respective Governments. The payment for the transit of those mails is made to the Italian and French post offices, and is regulated by the Postal Convention of Washington. I understand that the inward mail from Naples is paid for by the Australian Government, who are content with the ordinary train service, whereas the English Government, deem it necessary to have a special train for the outward mail.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING — INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what progress has been made by the Coomassie relief column; and will he state what number of persons escaped from the fort with the governor, and how many reached Cape Coast Castle.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: According to the latest information, Colonel Willcocks was at Bekwai, about twenty miles from Coomassie, on the 12th instant. It will be seen, on reference to the telegrams from Sir F. Hodgson which were published in the newspapers on the 7th and 10th instant, that the column which left Coomassie was 600 strong, including twenty-six Europeans, and was accompanied by 700 carriers, and that on the way to the coast seven men were killed, and two officers and some more men died of their wounds or were missing. The exact number of those who reached Cape Coast is not stated.

INDIA FAMINE—ADVANCES TO LAND CULTIVATORS.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what are the conditions laid down by the Government of India under which advances are made to the cultivators in the famine districts for restocking their farms; and whether such advances are by gift or by loan, and, if by loan, what are the conditions of repayment, and what is the total amount hitherto advanced or promised by the Government of India for that purpose.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The general conditions of Government advances to cultivators, for the restocking of their farms are (1) that they are to be free of interest; (2) that the first instalment of repayment will not be demanded for at least twelve months; (3) that the local governments may hereafter grant remissions in respect of these advances, thus converting them into gifts, according to the circumstances of the recipients. According to the last advices, the sum allotted by Government for these advances was £820,000. The hon. Member is of course aware that a large part of the charitable fund raised by subscription has been devoted to this same purpose.

ST. PETERSBURG HERRING TRADE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg has yet been able to secure improved facilities for the discharge and storage of herrings at that port.

*MR. BRODRICK: Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg was informed by the Russian Government in September last that arrangements had been made for the erection of the buildings and execution of the works which were urgently needed for the discharge and storage of herrings at that port. No further complaints of defective accommodation have been received since that date.

TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION IN THE CHANNEL ISLANDS AND THE ISLE OF MAN.

*MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has been able to arrange to introduce the non-contentious Bill, involving no charge on the Imperial Exchequer, extending the Teachers' Superannuation Act to the Isle of Man and the Channel Isles this session.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir H. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): Yes, Sir; I hope to be able to introduce the Bill, or, rather, Bills—one for each island that desires it—to-morrow.

VACCINATION PROSECUTIONS—CASE OF F. J. CHATTING.

MR. LOUIS SINCLAIR (Essex, Romford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that Mr. F. J. Chatting was imprisoned for not paying a fine for non-compliance to an order for vaccination; that the warrant for his arrest was for Pentonville, but that he was taken to West Ham police station, then taken to Stratford police court, and kept without food from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. on 7th July; and that on his arrival at Pentonville, instead of being treated as a first-class misdemeanant, his clothes were taken from him, and that he was forced to wear a prison suit, and that he was subjected to other treatment which the Act does not permit; and whether he will take such steps as will prevent a recurrence of such proceedings.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: Chatting was not arrested till about 8.40 p.m. on the 6th. It was then too late to take him to Pentonville, so he was taken to West Ham police station, and thence on the next morning to the police court, in accordance with the ordinary practice, in order that he might go on to Pentonville by the afternoon van. He had breakfast at the station, and might have had lunch at the police court, but on being twice asked whether he wanted anything replied in the negative. At Pentonville the reception officer made a mistake and treated him like an ordinary prisoner. For this mistake he will be duly dealt with by the Prison Commissioners, and it is not one which is likely to recur.

MR. LOUIS SINCLAIR: Is no compensation or apology even to be made to this man?

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I have not considered the question of compensation.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD RE- HOUSING SCHEMES.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the School Board for London propose to discharge their obligations under their Provisional Confirmation Act of last year to rehouse persons of the labouring class displaced in the neighbourhood of Wood Street, Bethnal Green, by erecting dwellings in Parnell Road, Bow; and, if so, whether, as the proposed dwellings will be useless for the purpose of rehousing the persons so displaced, he will withhold his approval from the scheme.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The scheme indicated by the hon. Member forms only a part of proposals which have been laid before me by the London School Board, and are now under my consideration. I cannot yet say whether or not I shall approve them. But as regards the rehousing of the actual persons displaced, I may say that the buildings in Wood Street were demolished more than a year ago.

DORKING RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.

MR. CUBITT (Surrey, Reigate): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that on the 23rd ult. the Dorking Advertiser contained the copy of a letter sent by the Local Government Board to the Dorking Rural District Council, which that council had previously refused to make public pending further negotiations with the Board; and whether it is the custom of the Board to supply a copy of such letters to anyone who applies for them without reference to the authority to whom they were originally written; and, if not, if he will take steps to deal with the official who was responsible for the disclosure in this case.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): It is not the custom of the Local Government Board to supply as a matter of course a copy of a letter which they had addressed to a local authority to anyone applying for it. In the present case the letter was one which they had sent to the district council in sanctioning a loan for sewerage, and application for a copy of it was made by a ratepayer, with whom the Board had had some correspondence in connection with the loan. There did not appear to be any sufficient reason for refusing the application. The Board have no information as to the facts referred to in the first paragraph of the question.

DEVIZES PRISON—WARDER HARGRAVE'S PENSION.

MR. GOULDING (Wiltshire, Devizes): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can now state the decision of the Treasury in reference to the pension of Henry Hargrave, late warder of Devizes Prison, and whether the whole of the pension awarded to him by the Treasury should have been apportioned between Imperial and local funds.

MR. HANBURY: The Treasury, in October, 1898, awarded to Hargrave a pension of £44 12s. 2d. on the scale allowed by the Superannuation Act, 1859. In the following month the Home Secretary forwarded to the Treasury a resolution by the late prison authority (the Court of Quarter Sessions of the County of Wilts) asking that the pension might be increased to two-thirds of Hargrave's retiring salary, and stating that they were ready to pay the difference between the pension as already awarded, and the amount of such two-thirds. To this the Treasury assented, and the increased rate asked for was awarded. The Local Government auditor of the county accounts has now reported that the quarter sessions has no power to fulfil their undertaking, and Hargrave can thus receive only the amount of the original award. The words of the Prisons Act, 1877, will not allow the Treasury to pay the excess for which the quarter sessions made themselves responsible. The case of Hargrave and other prison officers whose pensions are affected by this decision appears one of hardship, and I hope that a Bill may be passed early next session giving the local authorities power to pay the excess pension which they have always desired to do.

RAILWAY PASSENGERS' FREE LUGGAGE.

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devon, Barnstaple): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Midland Company has given notice that from an early date the amount of free luggage that will be allowed to passengers will be 150 pounds first class, and 100 pounds third class, and whether he will communicate with the other companies with the view of urging them to adopt a similar limit.

MR. HANBURY (for Mr. RITCHIE): The Board of Trade are in correspondence with the Railway Association on the subject of excess luggage, and will consider the expediency of raising the point made by the hon. Baronet in a subsequent communication to that body. The Board of Trade understand that several other important companies have adopted the increased scale, and it is to be hoped that the example will be followed by others.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): Will the Board of Trade lay upon the table the correspondence up to date?

MR. HANBURY: I will consult my right hon. friend as to that.

PILLAR BOXES IN THE METROPOLIS.

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will state how many pillar letter boxes there are in the metropolitan area; how many of these are divided into two compartments; how many of these latter are within the E.C. district; and, what is the reason persons posting in one part of London are obliged to sort their letters, under pain of having the delivery delayed, while no such obligation is imposed on persons posting in other parts of London.

MR. HANBURY: The number of wall and pillar letter boxes (other than those in use at post offices) in the metropolitan area is 2,988. In the Eastern Central district there are 156 boxes, ninety-nine being pillar and fifty-seven wall boxes. Of the ninety-nine twenty-six have two compartments, and of the fifty-seven twenty-three are double boxes, i.e., two placed side by side and counting as one box. The duplicating arrangement will be extended as rapidly as possible in the Eastern Central district. The reason why it is desired that letters for (1) London and abroad, (2) provinces, should, so far as the Eastern Central District is concerned, be posted separately, is that the two classes of letters are now dealt with in different buildings a mile apart, and that at the busiest parts of the day each class is taken direct to the office appropriated to that class. When they are not posted separately a certain portion of them must necessarily be taken in the first instance to the wrong office, and then it is sometimes impossible to avoid delay.

*MR. COHEN asked whether it was intended to extend the system of duplicate boxes to the whole of London.

MR. HANBURY replied that the Eastern Central District must first be dealt with on account of the enormous number of letters posted in that district, and owing to the fact that room could not be found to deal with them at St. Martin's-le-Grand.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WORKS DEPARTMENT—EMPLOYEES' GRIEVANCES.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that for the last thirty years the men of the Works Department have had an outing on the first Saturday of July, and that on the occasion they have been in the habit of coming to work on the morning of the day, and withdrawing at about 8.30 a.m., and have received pay for one half day, paying for the outing themselves; and will he explain why they have been this year deprived of this half-day's pay.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): The facts are as stated in the hon. Member's question. The practice referred to has applied, I understand, only to the works contractor's men employed about this building, and it is proposed to substitute some more satisfactory arrangement. Meantime the half-day's pay this year will be made good.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE REGULATIONS IN NORFOLK.

MR. SOAMES (Norfolk, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if his attention has been drawn to the resolutions with reference to foot and mouth disease passed by the Norfolk County Council on the 7th instant; and whether, in the event of another out-ask, the Board of Agriculture will adopt the suggestions put forward in those resolutions.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS (for Mr. LONG): I have received a copy of the resolutions to which the hon. Member refers. I shall be glad to give them my very careful consideration, but I could not properly enter into any undertaking as to the course which it would be my duty to adopt should any further outbreak of the disease unfortunately take place.

SANITATION IN THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Secretary for Scotland is aware that the medical officer of health for Ross and Cromarty in his report for last year states that, in a township in the Island of Lewis, there were forty-one cases of typhoid fever in a population of 300 within a period of six months, and points out that, although an isolation hospital is urgently necessary, the local authorities are powerless to provide one owing to the rates for the various parishes throughout the island being already so high; and, in view of the insanitary condition of many of the parishes in the island, will he consider the expediency of either urging the Treasury to provide the requisite funds for the erection of an isolation hospital, or introduce legislation at an early date such as will admit of the Congested Districts Board applying a portion of the funds at its disposal for the erection and maintenance of isolation hospitals where urgently needed in the congested area.

MR. WEIR: I beg also to ask the Lord Advocate, as representing the Secretary for Scotland, whether he is aware that the last report of the medical officer of health for Ross and Cromarty shows that if the Sanitary Clauses in the Public Health (Scotland) Act were strictly enforced in the Island of Lewis a large number of the inhabitants would be homeless; and will he state what steps he proposes to take in order to place the island on a satisfactory sanitary basis.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): In reply to Questions 23 and 24 as to the sanitary condition of the Island of Lewis, I must point out that the enforcement of the new provisions of the recent Public Health Act can be undertaken only gradually and with caution, both for the reason adduced by the hon. Member himself and because of the reluctance which he must know exists in the Highlands to removal and to isolated treatment of infectious cases. The Local Government Board are not inactive, and I know from official and other channels that progress is being made and that in some districts the present conditions compare very favourably with those observed not many years ago. I am informed by the Local Government Board that they are at the present moment in communication with more than one local authority in the island districts regarding new hospital accommodation, and plans are in hand for an hospital in the Carloway district. The Secretary for Scotland is not prepared at present to undertake legislation in connection with the matter.

SCOTTISH FISHERIES—AVOCH (ROSS-SHIRE) HARBOUR.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Fishery Board have now under consideration a proposal for improving the harbour accommodation at Avoch, Ross-shire; and can the Board now see their way to make a grant in aid of the work.

MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: An application for a grant towards improving Avoch harbour has been received by the Fishery Board, and has been remitted to a committee of their number for a report, on receipt of which the Board will be able to arrive at a decision.

DEPORTATION OF PAUPERS TO IRELAND.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: On behalf of the hon. Member for the St. Patrick Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Camberwell Board of Guardians intend sending Joseph Jones to Ireland against his will, although he has spent forty years in London; and whether, pending a change in the law, he can arrange that Joseph Jones can be retained in Camberwell.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): My right hon.

friend has asked me to reply to this question. I do not know how long the pauper referred to has resided in England, but I understand that he has previously been twice removed to Ireland, and that an order was obtained by the Camberwell Guardians on the 6th instant for his being again removed to that country. The pauper has, however, now given additional particulars as to his residence in Camberwell, and the guardians are causing further inquiries to be made. If the result is to show that he is settled in Camberwell, the order will not be proceeded with; but there is no power to require the guardians to abstain from removing the pauper to Ireland pending any alteration in the law on the subject, assuming that he is legally removable.

GREYSTONES (CO. WICKLOW) FORESHORE.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade is he aware that since the Board of Trade declined to prohibit the removal of gravel from the foreshore below high-water mark at Greystones, county Wicklow, English steamers are engaged in taking cargoes of it to Liverpool; whether the gravel is being sold; and, if so, by whom; whether the landlord of the foreshore above high-water mark has consented to the removal of the gravel; and whether the removal of the gravel will endanger the safety of the Wicklow Railway line; and whether he will make an inquiry into the matter.

MR. HANBURY (for MR. RITCHIE): Gravel is to some extent removed from the foreshore below high-water mark at Greystones, but the Board of Trade do not know by whom, or where it is taken to. I understand that the owner of the beach above high-water mark allows gravel to be removed therefrom. The safety of the railway line is primarily a matter for the railway company, who have made no complaint on the subject, and at present the Board of Trade see no reason for an inquiry, as suggested by the hon. Member.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: Is it not the duty of the Board of Trade to see to this?

MR. HANBURY: No; the Board of Trade is not responsible, so I am informed.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Who has control, then, over the removal of the gravel?

MR. HANBURY: I can only give the answer which has been placed in my hands.

LISTOWEL-BALLYBUNION RAILWAY.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can give any information as to the approximate cost of the railway from Listowel, county Kerry, to Ballybunion, a seaside watering resort, which railway is built on the Lartigue single rail system.

MR. HANBURY (for MR. RITCHIE): The railway company state as follows—

“The Ballybunion Railway cost thirty-three thousand pounds, including purchase of land, rolling stock, and everything connected with it.”

This amount is shown in the annual Railway Returns laid before Parliament as the total authorised share and loan capital of the company, the whole of which has been paid up and raised.

MR. FLAVIN: Is this the only railway on the Lartigue system to be found in the United Kingdom?

MR. HANBURY: I cannot say.

GREEVEGUILLA (CO. KERRY) MAILS.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that dissatisfaction prevails in the western portion of Greeveguilla, situate near Killarney, county Kerry, owing to the fact that there is not a daily delivery of letters in that district; and whether, seeing that the Killarney Rural District Council passed a unanimous resolution in favour of a daily delivery of letters, and having regard to the representations made and the inconvenience caused, the Post Office authorities will take steps to remedy the grievance complained of.

MR. HANBURY: Applications have been received from persons residing in the townlands of Toornanonagh and Leamyglissane, which are in the neighbourhood of the Greeveguilla Post Office, for a delivery of correspondence on six days a week instead of four, as at present. In November last the delivery of letters the neighbourhood was increased in frequency from two to four days a week in some cases, and from three to four days a week in other cases, and fresh returns are now being taken of the correspondence for the places in question, with the view of ascertaining whether a delivery every week day is now warranted.

MR. FLAVIN: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say it is under consideration whether the application shall be acceded to?

MR. HANBURY: Yes, that is so.

IRISH CATTLE SENT TO THE PORT OF LONDON.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state by what authority and for what reason cattle sent from Irish ports are prohibited from landing at the Port of London, although up till about thirty years ago such landing was permitted.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS (for Mr. LONG): There is no prohibition, so far as I am aware, against the landing of cattle from Ireland in the Port of London, but they could not, of course, be brought to the Deptford Foreign Animals Wharf, which is devoted exclusively to the reception of foreign animals.

MONAGHAN PETTY SESSIONAL APPEALS—CASES OF M'GUIGAN AND HUGHES.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the case of M'Guigan and Hughes, sentenced at the Monaghan Petty Sessions Court to long terms of imprisonment, and denied the right of appeal on a technicality raised by the Crown, whether he will advise the reconsideration of the sentences with a view to their mitigation.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): It is not for me to act as suggested in the question. Any memorial from the prisoners, or on their behalf, praying for a mitigation of sentence, should be addressed to the Lord Lieutenant, in whom alone is vested the exercise of the prerogative of mercy.

BELFAST LAND COMMISSION—INCREASES OF RENT.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the recent increases of rent made at Belfast by the Land Commissioners, and to the statement of Mr. Commissioner O'Brien as to the effect which these decisions are likely to have on rents in South Antrim and North Down; and whether, in view of the feeling produced amongst farmers in Ulster by the proceedings at the Commission, rules will be framed for the future guidance of the sub-commissioners.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: My attention was only called to this matter by a newspaper cutting which I received from the hon. Gentleman on arrival at the House this afternoon. With respect to the second paragraph, the framing of rules is entirely one for the consideration of the Land Commissioners themselves.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT—RATE ADJUSTMENTS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he is aware that in many electoral divisions in Ireland, under the adjustment order of the Irish Local Government Board, a rate which has accrued due in past years before the passing of the Local Government Act is about to be levied; whether the Irish Local Government Board have refused the application of several county councils in Ireland to permit the payment of this rate, which must now be borne exclusively by the occupiers, to be discharged by instalments, on the ground that such a course would be in contravention to law; and whether, having regard to the fact that the landlords are now exempted from contribution to this rate for the payment of half of which they would have been liable had it been levied when it accrued due, any steps will be taken to relieve the occupiers of a greater liability for the payment of this rate than that to which they were originally subject, having regard to the fact that the responsibility for the delay in the levy does not rest with them.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This question presumably refers to an adjustment order, declaring in respect of each union the balances due from electoral divisions to the union, and from the union to electoral divisions. The answer to the second paragraph is in the affirmative. As respects the last paragraph, no steps can be taken to relieve the occupiers of any portion of the rate for the adjustment of the balances due from electoral divisions to the union, nor on the other hand can any allowances be made to the landlord where a credit balance has been carried forward to a division by the order owing to the last rate made by the board of guardians on that division having been unnecessarily high. The debits and credits to be adjusted are, generally speaking, insignificant.

IRISH LOAN FUND BOARD.

MR. DILLON : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the sixty-second annual Report of the Loan Fund Board for Ireland, which states that the existing statutory powers of the Board are not sufficient to enable them to control effectively the operations of loan fund societies; and seeing that the House of Commons Committee of 1855 unanimously reported that legislation giving the Board greater powers of control was necessary, whether he can state why nothing has been done to carry out this recommendation of the Committee, and when the Government propose to introduce a Bill dealing with this subject.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. As respects the second paragraph I am unable to answer for my predecessors for the forty years following 1855. As the hon. Member is aware, a Bill has passed through all its stages in Parliament during the present session which meets the most pressing of the difficulties and hardships of the existing position; but the larger question of how to deal with the loan fund system generally is one respecting which I am not prepared at the present moment to make any statement.

MR. DILLON : But why has nothing been done?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : We endeavoured to pass a Bill last year, but were prevented by the action of the hon. Member and his friends. We have passed one this year.

MR. DILLON : That Bill does not deal with the point raised in my question.

BELFAST RATES.

MR. MACALEESE : I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether, having regard to Sub-section 9 of Section 54 of the Local Government Act of 1894, the public health charge of 7½d. in the £ in the city of Belfast is a rate for which immediate lessees are proportionately liable under any Act at present in force.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): The rate of 7½d. in the £ referred to is not a public health charge within the meaning of Section 54, Sub-section 9 and Section 57 of the Act of 1894, because Belfast is an urban sanitary district. It is the portion of the borough rate levied for defraying the expenses incurred under the Public Health Acts in Belfast in pursuance of Section 226 of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, and the occupier has not by law any right of deduction in respect of the borough rate.

GLEBE LOANS ACTS.

MR. M'GHEE (Louth, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Treasury is making a profit out of the loans under the Glebe Loans Acts; whether he is aware that the Treasury admit that circumstances of hardship are suffered by glebe loan borrowers; and whether, in view of the fact that the Government are making a large reduction in the tithe-rent payable by Irish landlords, he can see his way to recommend the Treasury to make a substantial reduction in the annual instalments payable by glebe loan borrowers in Ireland.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : I understand the statement in the first paragraph is disputed by the Treasury. The second paragraph presumably refers to the passage in Sir David Harrel's letter of the 6th May, 1898, which expressly points out that, in the opinion of the Treasury, any hardships suffered by present incumbents are not of a kind calling for relaxation of the terms of the loans to borrowers. The whole matter has been fully placed by the Irish Government before the Treasury, and any further Questions on the subject should be addressed to that Department.

INSPECTOR GENERAL ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is proposed to fill the position of Inspector General of Royal Irish Constabulary by the promotion of an officer serving in the force, or whether it is the intention of the Government to fill the position by the appointment of an officer not belonging to the force; and, if so, what are his qualifications for the position.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The position of Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary has been offered to and accepted by Colonel Neville Chamberlain, at present in South Africa. In the opinion of the Irish Government he possesses the qualifications of experience and capacity which fit him for the position.

MR. DILLON: Does the right hon. Gentleman say that this gentleman has any experience whatever of police duties?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Not directly of police duties, but he has had plenty of experience—in South Africa, for instance.

MR. FLAVIN: Has he ever served an hour in the Irish constabulary? Is it because he served in South Africa that he is going to be appointed over the heads of other officers?

CASE OF EDMUND CARMODY.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Edmund Carmody, of Cuss, county Kerry, who was convicted at the Cork winter assizes in December, 1898, and sentenced to three years penal servitude, was mainly the support of his father and mother; and whether, seeing that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has received a petition, largely signed by magistrates, clergymen, and the general public, praying for the release of the prisoner, who has now served more than half his sentence, he will recommend the consideration of his case.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have no information as to the first paragraph. The case of this prisoner has been twice before the Lords Justices on a memorial for a mitigation of sentence—the last occasion so recently as April of this year; but it was decided that the law should take its course. It is not my province to take the action suggested at the conclusion of the question.

MR. FLAVIN: May I again ask why the same clemency has not been extended to this man as was given to Lord Kenmare's bailiff?

[No answer was given.]

IRISH COUNTY COURT ADMINISTRATION.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: On behalf of the hon. Member for the St. Patrick Division of Dublin I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether he intends to introduce a Bill to amend the grievances complained of by traders in connection with the administration of the County Court Acts (Ireland).

MR. ATKINSON: I beg to call the hon. Member's attention to the County Courts (Ireland) Bill, introduced by the Lord Chancellor for Ireland, in another place, and which is down for the Committee stage to-day.

SUNDAY OPENING OF PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

MR. MASSEY-MAINWARING: I beg to ask the first Lord of the Treasury why catalogues cannot be purchased in the National Gallery and other public galleries in London, although catalogues are procurable on Sundays at the Wallace Collection at Hertford House and at the National Portrait Gallery.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed, with regard to the National Gallery, that the demand for catalogues was so small when the gallery was first opened on Sundays that the sale was discontinued when the police took charge of the Sunday opening. At South Kensington I learn there was practically no sale, as every object is described on labels. As to the other places named in the question catalogues are on sale.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now make a statement of the intentions of the Government as to the legislative business of the remaining weeks of the session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I rise to make, in obedience to the promise which I gave to the right hon. Gentleman a week ago, my statement as to the future business of the session, and I think it will be convenient if I divide the Bills now on the Paper into a series of classes, and take each class by itself. The first class consists of those measures introduced since the Government asked for special privileges as regards time. With regard to those measures, I promised the House that if they proved controversial they should not be pressed; and of course that promise will be rigidly adhered to. The Government Bills introduced since the period I have named I believe are three small Departmental ones—the Bill of my right hon. friend the Home Secretary, the Isle of Man Bill, which, I believe, is wholly uncontroversial; a small Bill introduced a few days ago by the Chancellor of the Exchequer dealing with oil in tobacco—a Bill of which I confess myself quite ignorant, but which I understand meets with the general approval of those interested in the matter; and the third Bill is that introduced by my right hon. friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Naval Reserves Bill, the object of which is to make it possible to embody sailors and marines after their first period of twelve years service in the Reserve. I earnestly hope that the House will think fit to pass that Bill, which, I am convinced, will add materially to our naval defences and the strength of this country.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It has not yet been introduced.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No. It is a very short Bill of one clause. If opposed it cannot be passed, but I hope it will not be opposed. There are some other Bills which I hope to pass with regard to which no pledge has been given and which cannot pass if they are opposed. They are the Larceny Bill, two Local Government Board Bills for Ireland, a Poor Relief Bill for Ireland, and the Diocesan Records

Bill. I have no ground for thinking that these Bills will meet with opposition in any part of the House, but if they do they will not be pressed by the Government. The third class contains the two annual Bills which the House has to deal with every session—namely, the Public Works Loans Bill and the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. These are Bills which the House will have to put on the Statute-book. Then I come to the fourth class, which includes small Departmental Bills, which I think can easily be dealt with in the interstices of more important or at all events of more far-reaching measures, and which will not, I think, actually prolong the session—the County Courts Investment Bill, the Inebriates Amendment Bill, the Post Office (Sites) Bill, the Elementary Education (England) Bill, and two Irish Education Bills, which I believe are desired by hon. Members opposite. That is the list of Departmental Bills. Then there are four Military Bills on the Paper which have come down to us from another place. Of these one is, I am sorry to say, destroyed by the fact that it does not technically comply with the Standing Orders of the House—that is, the Manœuvres Bill. I need say no more about that. There remain the Volunteer Bill, the Reserve Forces Bill, and the Military Lands Bill. The Volunteers Bill is a short Bill. It is designed to carry out two objects unanimously recommended by the Committee which sat in 1894, and which it is exceedingly desirable should be carried out. The Reserve Forces Bill is to do away with a defect which the recent mobilisation of forces in this country has brought to light. It appeared that in order to carry out the present law it was necessary to mobilise no less than 8,000 men, and as soon as they were mobilised they had to be given leave of absence. It would be, I think, very important that we should put that measure on the Statute-book. The Military Lands Bill is one which I think—from all the conversation which reaches me and from discussion in the public press in regard to the necessity of increased accommodation for ranges and for the purposes of training in shooting—is really most important and ought to become law. It makes workable two Acts which this House has already passed, but which, for reasons it would not be proper for me to enter into now, are rendered absolutely ineffective by technical defects.

I refer to the Acts of 1892 and 1897. I believe that when my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War has an opportunity of explaining this Bill to the House it will probably be felt that it is a Bill which we ought to pass without any further delay. There is one clause in it which has led to a great deal of controversy, and as to which considerable difference of opinion prevails. It is the clause providing for the use of the machinery of the Allotments Act for the compulsory leasing of lands to be used for military purposes. There are obvious objections and difficulties both to the object of the clause and the method by which it seeks to obtain the object in view, and the Government do not propose to press that clause on the House. With that reservation, I hope that the Bill will not excite hostility in any quarter of the House. Then there are two Bills still before the Grand Committees—the Companies Bill and the Money-lending Bill. It would not be proper for me to make a final statement now as to Bills which are not absolutely before the House at this moment, but I have every hope that both Bills may become law before the end of the present session. As regards the Companies Bill, the details have no doubt excited a great deal of commentary and animadversion upstairs, but as regards the general principle we are generally agreed; and I hope that the modifications which have been introduced upstairs or promised for the Report stage are such as will mitigate or altogether remove the objections which may have been felt to the details. As to the Money-lending Bill, I remember that, when I was making a parallel statement to this last session, the Leader of the Opposition then expressed his regret that we had found it necessary to abandon the further consideration of that Bill. I think he singled it out from among other measures as one over which he dropped a pious tear; and therefore I trust he will assist us in our attempt to pass the Bill now.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I may have another tear to drop.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I need not mention the Irish Tithes Bill and the Agricultural Holdings Bill, because they have reached the Third Reading stage, and the House will naturally expect them to pass with no undue delay. We propose to drop the Factories and Workshops Bill, the Lunacy Bill, the Youthful Offenders Bill, the Savings Banks Bill, the Dogs Bill, the Sea Fisheries Bill, the Palatine Court of Durham Bill, and the Reformatories and Industrial Schools Bill. We cannot hope, either, to proceed further in the present session with the very important English educational measure which has recently been introduced in the Lords by the President of the Council. There is also a Scotch Education Bill about which I fear I must say the same thing. This Bill is one which we were particularly anxious to pass, but I have taken some trouble to inquire what views are held with regard to it; and though I believe that in Scotland generally it meets with a very large measure of support, yet it does raise more than one point of controversy, and is not popular in one or two districts in Scotland. In those circumstances, a Bill of that magnitude and importance can hardly hope to pass at the end of the session, but I earnestly hope that no long delay will occur before it is reintroduced and passed into law. I have now gone over the whole list of Bills now on the Paper, and it only remains for me to speak with regard to Supply, as to which also the right hon. Gentleman has, I believe, a question on the Paper. If the House grants, as I do not doubt that it will, the three additional days which I am about to ask for, we shall have four days remaining for Committee of Supply, as well as one day for Report. But in addition to the Supply which has been asked for in the ordinary Estimates of the year and in addition to any Supplementary Estimates of the ordinary kind, it will be necessary for my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War to introduce a very important Estimate—important both as to its amount and as to the subject with which it deals. Among other services that Estimate will provide for what, I hope, are the final payments for the South African War and the cost of the military operations in China, as well as some other very important items of Army expenditure. That is a Supplementary Estimate, but it appears to me that when an Estimate of that magnitude and dealing with topics of that importance is introduced at this stage of the session it is only fair to the House that it should not be one of the counted days.

in Supply, and therefore I shall endeavour to make such arrangements as will allow the House to have one day's discussion on it, without trenching on the twenty-three days allocated under the Standing Order. My right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will also have to ask the House before we separate to make further financial provision to meet the additional expenditure which is required in the main, but not wholly, by the Supplementary Estimate to which I have referred. I hope I have been clear, and that my statement will commend itself to the approval of the House.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I would venture to suggest that the most convenient course for discussing the statement of the right hon. Gentleman will be on the motion to be subsequently moved. It is always unsatisfactory to attempt to do so by means of question and answer. I have no doubt that hon. Members on both sides will find that the more convenient plan for giving expression to their views.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): Can the right hon. Gentleman give us some information which might facilitate the discussion? Will he say how he proposes to allocate the four remaining days of Supply?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. friend knows the principle on which the Government have invariably proceeded—that is, to consult the wishes and convenience of the House. I do not think it would be desirable for me to state at this moment how we shall allocate the days, because the course of events outside and other considerations make it inconvenient to settle the matter too long beforehand.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Have the Government power to give an additional day for the Supplementary Estimate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, it is possible, if I put some other business down first.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): Will a day be appropriated to the War Office Vote?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. I should be reluctant to promise that, not only on the general ground, but because I am not sure that one of the remaining days ought to be given to the War Office Vote. There must be further discussion of War Office affairs on the Supplementary Estimate, and the War Office has already had much discussion. The Vote has been held over in obedience to the very proper suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition in order that if unforeseen events occur there may be an opportunity of discussion.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): Of the remaining days, will not two be given, as usual, to the Colonial Office and the Foreign Office Votes?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is the ordinary form of allocation, but I do not wish to be induced to go further than I have already done.

MR. MACLEAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman now fix the date for the discussion of the Indian Budget?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will certainly be next week. I trust that that will be satisfactory.

MR. FLAVIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say in round figures what is the amount of the Supplementary Vote for South Africa?

THE IRISH LANGUAGE IN IRISH SCHOOLS.

[PROPOSED MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.]

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House in order to call attention to a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the refusal by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland to consider favourably the memorial presented to them by the managers of 1,200 National schools in Ireland praying that in Irish-speaking districts a bilingual system of education should be adopted, and that in other districts Irish should be taught as a remunerated subject in school hours.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has been good enough to hand me a copy of his motion, and I think that this is a question which I ought not to submit to the House under Standing Order No. 17 as one definite and of urgent importance. The alleged grievance is in itself rather a general and a continuing one than of sudden urgency. What, however, principally influences me is the fact that the First Lord of the Treasury has stated to the House that the Irish Education Estimates will be taken on Friday; and it is not only in accordance with the proper construction of the Standing Order, but in accordance with precedents, that where there is an almost immediate opportunity for discussing a matter of this kind that opportunity should not be anticipated. I feel bound, therefore, to say that I ought not to submit this motion to the House.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will not think I desire to dispute your ruling in any way if I ask for permission to point out that only one remaining day is left for Irish Estimates. A new scheme of primary education covering a multitude of points must be discussed on that day, and it is impossible to hope that during one sitting of the House the whole of that scheme could be discussed, and, in addition, this grievance about the Irish language. Therefore, it is perfectly impossible that the Irish education scheme can be fully discussed. Upon a point of order, I respectfully submit that the possibility of a discussion taking place on some future date does not exclude this matter from the interpretation of the Standing Order, and I wish to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the interpretation which you have yourself given on this very point. On the 6th of April last you said†—

“The Standing Order presents some difficulty in interpretation. When I came to the Chair I found the practice of the Speaker had been to deal with the question of definiteness himself.”

I wish to point out that this is not a general grievance, but a definite act—namely, the refusal of the Commissioners to accede to a particular memorial upon a particular point. You went on, upon the occasion I alluded to, to further state—

“But as regards the urgency and public importance of the subject they have practically always been left to the decision of the House by the rising of at least forty Members in their places. I say ‘practically,’ for certainly I do not understand that the Speaker is bound to put a question as one of urgency and of public importance if it is obviously ridiculous or frivolous, or so obviously unimportant that the Speaker ought not to put it.”

I submit that unless you, Mr. Speaker, take the view that this subject is “ridiculous or frivolous” it is in order under your ruling, which I have just quoted.

*MR. SPEAKER: On the occasion to which the hon. Member refers I was suddenly asked a general question, and I do not pretend that the words I used contained a considered or exhaustive definition of all the grounds upon which the question of leave to move should not be put from the Chair. The words “ridiculous and frivolous” were, probably, too strong. On the present occasion I have considered the matter carefully, and I must adhere to my ruling not to submit the motion for the adjournment to the House.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: It is impossible for me to contest the matter further, although I am led to hope that an opportunity will be forthcoming. I beg to give notice that on the Second Reading of the Primary Education Bill I shall move—

“That this House declines to give any additional powers to the Commissioners until they have amended their code of rules and regulations so as to provide for the teaching of Irish in the schools under their control.”

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (SUPPLY).

Ordered, That three additional days be allowed to the Business of Supply.—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (GOVERNMENT BUSINESS).

Motion made and Question proposed, "That, for the remainder of the session, Government Business be not interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order regulating the Sittings of the House; and may be entered upon at any hour, though opposed, and that at the conclusion of Government Business each day Mr. Speaker do adjourn the House without Question put."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I do not think that we have any reason to complain of the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, but there is one point on which I think the House expected to hear a little more. It is the point which governs to a large extent the whole of his statement—and that is, when does the right hon. Gentleman expect that the House will be relieved from its duties? It is clear that if the House is going to sit well on into August it will be able to transact a larger amount of business than it can undertake if it is interrupted at an earlier period, and, therefore, though the right hon. Gentleman's statement is satisfactory so far as it goes, he has not told us what his views are on that question. Those views affect not only the Bills, but also the important question of Supply. There are certain Votes which must be taken, and on which it is only right that the House should have a full opportunity of discussion. I would name, for example, in such a year as this, the Colonial Office Vote. It embraces not only the whole of the South African question, but the question of Ashanti and other questions. Then there is the Foreign Office Vote, upon which the whole situation in China has to be considered. These two Votes appear to me to require a day for the discussion of each of them. Then the right hon. Gentleman passed somewhat lightly over the War Office Vote. There was force in the inquiry of the hon. Member for West Belfast, when he asked whether a day would be granted for a discussion of it. Although it is true that the War Office Vote can be suspended, as it were, and put off until an advanced period of the session in order that we may have an opportunity of considering the military questions generally, yet there are this year in the minds of hon. Members many topics connected with that Vote and the conduct and disposition of business by the Secretary of State himself, which will surely require a considerable time for the discussion which may be needed on that important subject. There are fifteen Bills which are more or less non-contentious, but a non-contentious Bill, I need hardly say, is not a definition which always maintains itself. Even in the course of half an hour since the right hon. Gentleman made his statement, one of those Bills apparently has transferred itself to the category of being a contentious measure, because notice of an Amendment has now been given to it, which transfers it from one list to the other. On the whole, however, I see no reason to dispute in the main the classification of the right hon. Gentleman. But then we come to one or two Bills which come from the House of Lords, mostly military Bills. With regard to these, I say at once that I think the House may very well be called upon to consider and to pass the Reserve Forces Bill and the Military Lands Bill, which, as the right hon. Gentleman says, carry out the intentions which are already expressed in the regulations in regard to the organisation of the Army. It can hardly be denied that the Volunteers Bill involves or may involve a serious alteration in the character of the Volunteer force. It accepts as a permanent condition of service for Volunteers a kind of service which has never been contemplated hitherto. But I would appeal to the Government on broader grounds. I think it is most undesirable at the end of the session to make a material difference in the constitution of the Volunteer force, or indeed I may say in any other branch of our military forces. We are all impressed with the necessity of doing everything we can to strengthen the defences of the Empire and to increase military efficiency, but that is not a thing to be done in a hurry. Many of those who are best qualified to advise the Government on such a matter are at present engaged in South Africa, and surely it would be better to defer the matter. What is to be gained by forcing the Bill through the House under pressure? The Bill ought to be reserved for fuller and wider consideration on the part of those who are responsible for advising Parliament on the subject. On all these grounds I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not persist in the Volunteers Bill. If he does, I am afraid that there will be a considerable amount of time spent on it, and that it will evoke a considerable amount of opposition also, though it is not so much on the ground of that opposition as on the broader grounds I have mentioned that I would appeal to him. Then the right hon. Gentleman recalled the fact that I had last year personally expressed some regret that the Money-lending Bill was lost, but I would point out that an expression of regret at the way the Government have arranged their business is quite consistent with a perfectly good disposition towards the Bill itself, and when I expressed some doubt a few days ago, it was on the ground that the Bill had become so pushed towards the end of the session that it was almost hopeless to get it through its stages now. There are one or two other Bills not mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman and which, I suppose, from the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has taken no notice of them, are also to be regarded as lost.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not speaking of Government Bills. Is there no hope for other than Government Bills? Is not this a strange arrangement, that we have had Bills examined with the greatest care by Standing Committees, considered, amended, and thrown into better shape, and then dropped without a word of regret, and without any possibility of making use of the pains, and labour, and time lavished upon them? There are two Bills not affecting this House which I have in my mind, and surely it is most desirable that some corner should be found for them. They are both Bills which would be extremely well received in the colonies, and now we are all speaking of a closer connection with the colonies and our desire to show a better feeling towards them. One is the Copyright Bill, which has passed the House of Lords, and which I believe has a clause embodying an arrangement which Canada has been struggling for for years and years, and which has now been licked into such a shape as to give perfect satisfaction to the Canadian people. I hope there may be means found of passing that Bill. Then there is the Colonial Marriages Bill, which has had a chequered career. It has now gone triumphantly through the House of Lords, and I believe it is unanimously desired by the colonies. Yet the Government, who are prating every day about their desire to consider the views of our colonial fellow-subjects in every way, now propose calmly to give the cold shoulder to this important Bill and proceed with those comparatively unimportant measures of which the right hon. Gentleman has given a list. I hope the right hon. Gentleman may be able to modify in some measure what he has promised; but I think what above all others would facilitate Government business and would be likely to put the House in a sympathetic mood, would be if the right hon. Gentleman could state now when, according to his estimate, the remaining business can be finally disposed of.

MR. LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I hope my right hon. friend will adhere to his statement regarding the Bills by which he intends to lighten the ship; but he referred to a certain Bill which he said would not be proceeded with if it were opposed. I mean the Diocesan Records Bill, which is opposed by at least two hon. Members on this side of the House. There are two notices of motion against, and so far as it has been discussed it has been by no means favourably received. I was very much surprised to hear my right hon. friend say that he proposed to push it through. I feel sure it will be opposed very seriously, and I hope my right hon. friend will not force it through the House of Commons at one o'clock or two o'clock in the morning.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I have heard with great regret that it is proposed once more to abandon the Lunacy Bill, because it is urgently required, alike for the insane as well as for the protection of the public. We have been told on no less an authority than that of the Lord Chancellor that grave abuses have taken place. This Bill would provide safeguards against those abuses, and it also contains provisions which are absolutely necessary for the proper execution of the principal Act. The Bill was originally introduced into Parliament in 1897. From that time it has been regularly introduced at the beginning of every session, and having passed through all its stages in another place, has been regularly abandoned in this House at the end of every session. I think that is very much to be regretted. The Government have treated this question, which is one of great social importance, with contemptuous indifference, and I think it is a public scandal that a Bill of this kind should be abandoned year after year, especially when we know that lunacy is unhappily increasing by leaps and bounds. There is an additional and very strong reason why this Bill should be proceeded with during the present session. We have been startled recently by revelations as to a practice which has been proved to exist in two metropolitan unions, and which I believe to be widely prevalent, under which poor law officers—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member appears to me to be discussing the Bill.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I will, of course, submit to your ruling, Sir; but I think that I can show that my observations are strictly in order, and for this reason: The other day the Lord Chancellor gave a pledge that a clause to deal with this particular matter should be introduced into this Bill, and therefore, if this Bill is abandoned,† the special mode of dealing with the public scandal to which I have referred, which was indicated by the Lord Chancellor, will fall through. I think, under the circumstances, we are justified in asking the right hon. Gentleman, if this Bill is to be abandoned, what steps he proposes to take to give effect to the pledge of the Lord Chancellor? I hope this important matter will receive the attention which I think I may fairly claim for it, and that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to reconsider the decision he has just given.

MR. DILLON: This motion was never made with less justification than on the present occasion. It is a recognised custom, when the Government asks the House of Commons to make what is really a very great sacrifice, for the House to examine into the use which the Government have made of their facilities during the session. During the many years I have been in close attendance in this House no Government have made such a bad use of the time at their disposal, and have been less entitled to ask the House to make this sacrifice than the present Government. We have had many organised counts-out by the Government during the session. We had to adjourn for a garden party—a thing unheard of in the history of the House. In fact throughout the session there has been displayed—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. The debate on the particular Bill he refers to was adjourned, but Government business was proceeded with.

MR. DILLON: Important Government business on that occasion was interrupted for the purpose of the garden party. The Government then put forward a non-contentious Bill, and afterwards organised a count-out, which was successful. I believe it would have been more honest had the Government made the motion for the adjournment of the House. I allude to this matter as an illustration of the way the Government have used the time of the House at their disposal during the session. An impression has been created on my mind and on that of others on this side of the House, that the Government were in the same chronic position as the Irish judges who tried to persuade the public that they had something to do—a task of enormous difficulty. The Government have had little or nothing to do, and what they had to do they did not do. Instead of devoting time to discussing the misdeeds of the great public Departments, to the scandals at and mismanagement of the War Office, and matters of real public interest—such matters as are concerned with the proceedings of the Executive Government itself—they have frittered away the time of the House in very uninteresting business. And now, at this period of the session, they come down, as if they had been a hardworking and industrious Government, and put us in the position of being at their mercy to keep us every night to three or four in the morning. In my opinion they have established no claim, by their conduct during the session, to that indulgence at the hands of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House told us that it was the intention of the Government to pass the Companies Bill and the Money-lending Bill, besides a number of other small Bills, including some Irish Bills, which he said were non-contentious. Some of these non-contentious Bills, I am afraid, he will find out are contentious when we come to deal with them; and I presume they will be dropped. But I do not believe that there is any prospect of passing the two important Bills the right hon. Gentleman mentioned—the Companies Bill and the Money-lending Bill. Having the misfortune of being on the Standing Committee on Law, I protest against the Government doing now what they have done before—introducing Bills at this stage of the session they have no real intention of passing, and at the same time retaining Members locked up in the Committee rooms upstairs, where the atmosphere is atrocious, when there is no reasonable prospect of the Bills on which so much labour is expended being passed into law. I repeat it is most unreasonable to ask us to sit after twelve o'clock on the pretence that the Companies Bill and the Money-lending Bill are to be passed into law, when at a later stage the Government know they will be thrown overboard. But there is another ground on which I am entitled to oppose this motion, and that is the abuse of the time at the disposal of the Government in connection with Irish questions. Irish business, this year and last year, was chiefly concerned—as it generally is, except when some great Irish measure is brought forward—with the administration of the Executive in Ireland, and I protest against the custom of the Government in limiting and narrowing the opportunities for discussion of the conduct of the Executive Government in Ireland. What has been done this year? The Government have deliberately offered us only two nights for the discussion of the Executive Government in Ireland, while they have occupied nearly five nights of Government time in endeavouring to drive through the House one of the most iniquitous and scandalous Bills ever submitted to the House of Commons. I ask, is that a just or a reasonable way to deal with Ireland? We are told now that of the time which still remains to us we are to have only one further night to discuss Irish Supply, making three in all—a number utterly inadequate and insufficient. The result will be that this, as last year, more than half of the most important of the Irish Votes—not to speak of the minor details of Irish expenditure—will be closed or passed without any discussion. I think that is one of the greatest invasions on the true province and rights of the House ever attempted in the history of Parliament. For these reasons I am, for my part, entirely opposed to the motion before the House. I think this indulgence ought not to be given to the Government as a matter of course. It only ought to be granted when the House is convinced on examination that the Government have fairly and properly conducted the business of the session and put the time placed at their disposal to a fair and proper use. Finally, I think that the Government on the present occasion, when they are asking for greater facilities for sitting so late, ought to have told us at all events the proximate date at which they intend to bring the session to a close.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said that the most important matter announced by the Front Bench was that of the new Estimates. He called them new Estimates because they were practically new and raised new matters of policy. He would call attention to the provision of an order in the Business Paper which stated that any additional Estimates for any new service or matter not included in the original Estimates of the year should be submitted for the consideration of the Committee of Supply on any date not later than two days before the Committee closed. He was very anxious that that order should be observed, for there could be no question that in fact these were new Estimates, and would raise very serious questions which might even become more serious before the Committee discussed them. He congratulated Her Majesty's Government on having abandoned several Bills to which he himself had given his most determined opposition, including the Dogs Bill, the Savings Bank Amendment Bill, and the Undersized Fish Bill, his opposition to which had become historical. That Bill, which was the invention of the opposite side, had been introduced in different forms on six different occasions, and had been too lightly adopted by the present Government. He congratulated the Government on having, for the sixth time, abandoned an attempt to prevent the people from getting cheap food, and he hoped the attempt would never be renewed. He thought the motion of the Leader of the House was a very reasonable one. The First Lord of the Treasury had mentioned thirty Bills which might conceivably be passed, and which the right hon. Gentleman hoped might be passed before the end of the session; but he had sacrificed half a dozen of them, and more certainly would have to go. He believed that both the Companies Bill and the Money-lending Bill would also have to go. In the meantime the right hon. Gentleman had sacrificed three Bills in which he was particularly interested, and he expressed his gratitude to and admiration of the right hon. Gentleman for his sound discretion.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.) said that one of the measures which the First Lord of the Treasury proposed to proceed with was the Companies Bill. He would ask why a measure of such great gravity was not introduced at an earlier period of the session. The Bill was still being discussed upstairs, and it was most unreasonable to ask the House, when the measure came down there, to consider Amendments which involved very important variations of the permanent law of the country in regard to one of the most important branches of jurisprudence, in the small hours of the morning. If this measure was to receive adequate discussion it should be debated at an early period of the evening.

*MR. CHANNING protested against the motion. The fact that it had to be moved was a condemnation of the conduct of business by Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman had to put to his credit a very important reform in the conduct of the business of the House—namely, the allocation of certain days for the discussion of Supply. He desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in the present state of business the fact that he asked the House to sit up to any hour of the morning to discuss Bills of great importance was an indication that he and those who worked with him had not given sufficient consideration to the essential point that the Bills ought to have been introduced and discussed in the earlier part of the session. In recent years the earlier days of the session had been wasted in desultory discussions on Supply, which it would have been advantageous to have brought to an earlier conclusion. He hoped that the hon. Member for East Mayo would divide the House against the motion. He thought that instead of the House being asked at this time of the year to sit up to all hours to attempt to clear up important points and deal with important measures, as had been the case of late years, they ought to have taken earlier in the session. The right hon. Gentleman would remember that during the present session he had given members—and no doubt he had gained popularity in consequence—a much longer recess both at Easter and Whitsuntide. That was an altogether wrong principle, and it would have been much better if the House met earlier and forced important business through at an earlier date, and this portion of the session given over to lighter and more uncontroversial work. He wished to support the hon. Member for South Leeds with regard to the Companies Bill. It would be a very grave error of policy if that Bill were not proceeded with and passed into law during the present session. Both he and other Members of the House would be quite willing to form part of a quorum in order to help to carry such Bills forward, and they would deeply regret it if the Companies Bill was not passed. As an illustration of the way in which very important measures were rushed through, he drew attention to the fact that the discussion on the Third Reading of the Housing of the Working Classes Bill was curtailed and shortened in a manner which was very prejudicial to the interest of the great towns of this country. It was quite time that the way of ordering the business of the House, and the almost indecent manner in which it was conducted, was altered. All the labours of the Grand Committees with regard to the Companies Bill, and other important Bills, might now have to be thrown aside, and all the arrangements of the Government showed lack of consideration. It would be discreditable to the House if they did not clear up a creditable amount of work before they separated. He expressed a hope that in the future the work of the

tion would be so rearranged as to enable the House to discuss the most important business in the earlier part of the session. With regard to Supply, he noticed the provision to take an extra day in order to consider the questions raised by the Supplementary Estimate. That was a reasonable concession to the interest of the public and the House; but he hoped they would have some assurance that the two most important Votes which had to be considered before the session closed—the Colonial Vote, which involved the conduct of affairs in Cape Colony and South Africa, which was of vital importance, and the Foreign Office Vote, for which two full days ought to be assigned—would be brought on at the earliest possible moment; and that the earliest possible day would be given to the Colonial Vote. It would be most unsatisfactory to the country and to the House if that course was not pursued.

LORD BALCARRES (Chorley, Lancashire): I am in charge of a Bill which has gone through this House, and also the House of Lords, which has made a few trifling amendments in it, and it now awaits the consideration of this House. The amendments are of a purely formal character, but as the motion now stands the chances of the Bill passing are nil. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could meet such a case as this, and other measures which are uncontroversial, by allowing us to try and get them through after the Government business is concluded. By this motion the Government appropriate the whole of our time, and I wish to ask, on the conclusion of public business, that we private Members should be allowed to push forward our Bills. I suggest that we should be allowed fifteen minutes each day, otherwise, by the operation of the two words "I object," we shall lose some very useful measures.

MR. LLOYD - GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): I cannot help thinking that the Government are dealing rather harshly with the Bills of private Members. I refer particularly to the Temperance Bills, one of which has passed first and second reading, and through Committee as well, and will now be sacrificed. All these Bills are based on recommendations of Royal Commissions appointed by the Government and two of which were appointed by the present Government. Those Commissions, after sitting several years and after grave consideration, came to unanimous conclusions upon certain topics. The Government not being prepared to legislate upon them, private Members have brought in Bills dealing with one or two of the minor points, and the Government give them no facilities whatever. I hope temperance people will take into consideration that the Government now want to take all the remaining time, and they cannot find time for temperance legislation for the reason that there are six Military Bills, and the whole time of the House has been used for the discussion of military measures. Not a single hour can they find for temperance legislation, which would be carried through without a division. Then, with regard to the Companies Bill, I cannot understand why this Bill has not passed into law. I cannot conceive a greater insult to the House of Commons. A Grand Committee has been sitting for days, considering this Bill very carefully, and I do not believe that there has been any waste of time. The President of the Board of Trade does not suggest that the discussion has been unduly prolonged. The Government then go through the farce—for it is a farce unless it is proposed that we should carry it through—to suspend the Standing Orders to extend the time so that we may have an opportunity to carry it through. Is it to be expected that the Grand Committee should consider this very important Bill, sitting for an extra hour each day, when they know perfectly well that it is not proposed to give a Third Reading to the Bill? If that is so, it inflicts considerable humiliation upon the Grand Committee. The right hon. Gentleman ought not to have asked them to consider it unless he proposed to pass it. Here is the most important Bill of the session, when one takes into account the interests with which it deals, and the changes it proposes to make in the existing law; and when one considers the complicated character of its provisions, it is a Bill that should be considered very carefully. As the right hon. Gentleman has said, it is a Bill as to the principle of which there is no difference of opinion, but that is exactly the kind of Bill that requires the most consideration. When a Bill is introduced, and there is a contention as to the principle, Amendments are very often moved for the purpose of weakening it; but where the principle is agreed, Members join together in moving Amendments to strengthen the Bill, and this is the Bill which the Government cannot find time before twelve o'clock to consider. For this the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is responsible. He has managed matters in such a way that the most important Bill is introduced at the end of the session. It is then taken upstairs, where it cannot be disposed of until the end of this week, and it cannot be before this House until next week, when other Bills will prevent its being taken until after twelve. I support the appeal of my hon. and learned friend, that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury shall give us a pledge not only that the Bill shall be carried through, but that it shall be considered at a time when Members are able to apply their energies to it without distraction.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.), who was several times called upon to speak up, was understood to say that he would like to ask a question with regard to the Government proposals as to the widows and children of those who fell in the war. The right hon. Gentleman had said in answer to a question that it was the intention of the Government to deal with that matter. What he now wished to know was whether, before the House separated, the Government would announce to the country the proposals they had in view, and whether the right hon. Gentleman would undertake that the Patriotic Commissioners would not be allowed to pursue their old tactics of accumulating the funds, which they had already begun to do. If the right hon. Gentleman could give an assurance on that point it would be of considerable importance to the country. He also desired to join in the appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to take the Companies Bill after twelve o'clock, for a reason which had not been put to the House. The Bill had come down from the House of Lords, and a great many points had been deferred for consideration, and if those important points were going to be raised at two or three o'clock in the morning a great deal of harm might be done to a very useful measure. He therefore appealed to the right hon. Gentleman not to ask the House to discuss these matters in the early hours of the morning.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am much afraid if the right hon. Gentleman takes the advice of the hon. Gentleman behind him he will not pass the Companies Bill this session. It is a very important Bill, but we know that some hon. Gentlemen are not very desirous that the Bill should become law; but if it is to be passed I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not listen to the appeal that has just been made. There is another Bill which has been sent down from the House of Lords, the Bill for the prevention of corruption, a most admirable Bill, which may be said to be a Governmental if not a Government Bill. It was brought in by the Lord Chief Justice. Now we know perfectly well that in the House of Lords there are a great many judicial Gentlemen of the very highest ability and reputation, and when a Bill has found favour with them we may regard its being sent here as an appeal by the Lord Chief Justice and the judicial bench of the House of Lords to the House of Commons to carry it through. This is a Bill which makes certain things frauds which are not frauds at the present time. I have before now expressed a not very high opinion of the House of Lords; but I always wish to be fair, and I think when the House of Lords does practical work we ought to give them encouragement by passing the Bills they send to us. Now, I should like to ask one or two questions as to Supply. It has been suggested that we shall have five days allotted to ordinary Supply and one day given to the Colonial Office Vote, and one each to the Foreign Office and War Office Votes; but I very much doubt whether one day will be sufficient for the Colonial Office Vote, because we have to deal not only with South Africa but several other matters—Ashanti, and so forth. With regard to the Foreign Office it is very desirable that some important discussion should take place before the House breaks up in regard to China. The right hon. Gentleman may say that we have the opportunity on the Supplementary Vote, and he also tells us that that is to cover money which is required for both China and South Africa. Such a discussion I do not think ought to be prolonged beyond twelve o'clock. The matter

a large and important one, and we know very well that after twelve o'clock speeches are not reported, and the debate somewhat perfunctory. If it goes over twelve o'clock, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to give it another day. There is one other question. I do not ask him to give the precise figure of the Estimate, but I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell the House what his idea is with regard to the future, about what the amount is of the Vote that he intends to ask for, together with the amount that the Government has in hand, so that we might form an opinion as to whether we are going to have an autumn session, as is suggested in the press, or whether we are going to have no further session of this Parliament. This is a very interesting question, and we should like to have all the light which the right hon. Gentleman can throw upon it. We do not wish him to tell us whether he is going to advise Her Majesty to dissolve the Parliament in the autumn; but if he will tell us about the amount of the Estimate and what the amount of the borrowing powers of the Government are we should be very interested, and it might help us to reason the matter out.

*COLONEL MILWARD (Warwickshire, Stratford-on-Avon) said he required no information on the point just mentioned, because whether the dissolution came early or late he hoped that Ministers would be prepared to face the consequences. He desired to support the appeal of the hon. Member for South Leeds with reference to the Companies Bill, that it should not be brought on for Report unless there was time to consider it seriously. He quite appreciated the fact that the members of the Grand Committee, who had spent so much time upon it, would feel disappointed if it did not pass, and there were a great many others who would be equally disappointed. The hon. Member for Northampton suggested that there were certain Members who did not desire to see it pass. He was not one of those. He wished to see it pass, but after consideration and in such a shape that it would not be at once rendered a dead letter by the legal gentlemen outside Parliament, who were even now preparing to drive a four-horse coach through it. It was a Bill of enormous importance, even to the working classes of the Midlands, who at the time of the cycle boom, when many bogus companies were promoted, put their earnings into various companies. The Bill was only introduced on the 26th of June, and it was impossible in so short a time to consider it as it ought to be considered, and to form such a Bill as ought to pass. The labours of the Grand Committee had not been wasted, and the Government would, after consideration, be advised to take up certain points, and he thought that another year, by taking up the Bill earlier in the session, a more complete and valuable measure would result from their efforts.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.) drew attention to the fact that on other occasions when this motion had been moved the right hon. Gentleman had stated that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to keep the House late every night. Although the right hon. Gentleman had given no such intimation on the present occasion he trusted that the House might assume that that was the case now. He understood that the House was to have Supplementary Estimates brought before them during the present session; but if that was the case, he apprehended they would be in a difficulty with regard to the Colonial Vote, because, as he understood the programme, three extra days had been given for Supply. The Irish Estimates were to be given one day, and if the Colonial Vote and the Foreign Office Vote took another day each, there would be no time left to discuss the War Office or any other Vote. Having regard to the importance of the foreign affairs all over the world, he hoped further time would be given.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Several questions have been asked and many pledges have been demanded from me, and while I cannot say that I shall be able to gratify all those who have made remarks, I shall endeavour as well as I can to go seriatim through the list of questions. The hon. Member who has just sat down says he hopes the sittings will not be unduly prolonged. I am very reluctant to put undue strain upon the House, but, although I hope there will be no formidable amount of business of Supply or of late sittings, I am not able to give any specific promise to the House on the subject. As regards Supply, I have said that I would so arrange that there would be one additional day outside the twenty-three allotted days. I hope to do that. May

I point out to the hon. Gentleman, as far as the Foreign and Colonial Offices are concerned, that there will not only be an opportunity of discussing them on the ordinary Votes, but there will be an opportunity of discussing, at any rate, very large and important sections of these questions upon the Supplementary War Estimates which concern the granting of money for South Africa and money for China. In addition to these opportunities there is, of course, always the opportunity given by the different stages of the Appropriation Bill; and I am bound to say that that seems to me sufficient, even in view of the exceptional circumstances in which the House finds itself. I think the Leader of the Opposition was a little unjust when he suggested that an inadequate time had been already given to the discussions of the War Office Estimates. The immense amount of time given to those discussions this session must have escaped his attention. It has not been an undue amount, I agree. Undoubtedly the War Office has been the office above all others before the public, and on which discussion may seem most legitimate. But I have done my best to add up roughly the number of nights given to War Office discussions, and I cannot make them out to be less than seventeen. To give seventeen days in one session to the discussion of one Department is surely not unfair even in the eyes of those most greedy of discussion and most anxious to probe the War Office questions to the bottom. In this annual debate the Leader of the House finds himself a sort of target to be shot at from many different quarters. There are the gentlemen who say that all the Bills which have been passed are trumpery and trifling measures, and that it is the Bills about which there is any doubt which are the important measures, and measures which it would be monstrous to drop. Then there are those who say, "Though the Government's Bills may be all very well, look at the private Bills abandoned by the Government! Let the Government press on with those and the House will be satisfied." Then there is a third and the commonest class of all, who say, "Above all do not sit after twelve o'clock." And there are others who say, "However important it may be to pass this Bill or that, it is most important of all to give us an early holiday." All these appeals excite my sympathy, but they cannot all be gratified, if hon. Members will go to bed when the clock strikes twelve, if they will be on the 1st of August, and if they will pass these great measures; these aspirations are evidently mutually contradictory and cannot all be satisfied even by the most ingenious arrangements of public business. And if they are contradictory aspirations and cannot all be satisfied, as manifestly they cannot, I do hope the Leader of the House may not be supposed to be in fault because he cannot make such arrangements as will enable hon. Gentlemen both to eat their cake and have it also. The hon. Member for Northampton wanted to know what the amount of the Supplementary Estimate was. My hon. friend the Under Secretary for War is not in the House, but the Estimate will be soon in the hands of hon. Members. I am afraid, however, that a disappointment is in store for the hon. Member for Northampton. The amount, even if I could give it down to the minutest fraction, would throw no light on the problem which interests him. The amount would be the same if the House of Commons were scattered to the winds in the next fortnight, or if it were to drag out a lingering existence to the last day allowed by the law. The Estimate has been framed wholly apart from those Parliamentary considerations which are so interesting to the hon. Member; and I am afraid that no light will be thrown upon them by the publication of the details for which the hon. Member is desirous. My noble friend the Member for the Chorley Division has made an appeal in favour of a Bill in which he is interested, and which has passed this House and the other House with only two or three trifling Amendments. Another Bill which has passed this House and in which only very small Amendments have been introduced in another place is the Bill giving compensation for accidents to agricultural labourers. It is evident that Bills of that character ought not to be sacrificed, and I think it is quite usual and invariable, when the Government has asked for these special privileges, that such non-controversial private Bills should be starred and therefore escape from the drastic and destructive effects of the resolution which I now ask the House to pass. I notice that there are two Bills in the list which I read, which I hoped were non-controversial in their character, but with regard to which strong opposition has been an-

is the Diocesan Records Bill another is an Irish Bill with respect which the leader of the Nationalist y has declared his intention of moving Amendment. [Mr. DILLON: The Irish Bills are controversial.] Then ppose the four Irish Bills will have to dropped. The hon. Member for th-west Bethnal Green reproached Government with having dropped the acy Bill. I greatly regret that it has 1 dropped; and I quite recognise that e are important provisions which it is ly most desirable to pass into law out delay. But the Bill is a long

It contains a large number of mis- neous administrative reforms which 3 impossible to pass through the use without considerable discussion; therefore it is with the greatest re- nance that I feel bound to adhere to decision already come to not to press measure on the attention of the use. I think I have dealt with almost y point which was raised, pt the Companies Bill. I stated the beginning of the debate ; that is a Bill which I hope be allowed to pass; and I see no on why it should not pass. The right . Gentleman said that I had missed most important element in my state- it, because I refrained from giving any e for the probable adjournment of the use. That date can never be given 1 assurance, and it could be given 1 less assurance than ever this r, because there are not only the s which I have mentioned, but the ncial proposals which have to be le, to be taken into account. I do like to say within a day or hour—or 1 within several days—when the ion will come to an end; but I shall reatly disappointed if it does not end ing the week beginning 5th August. pe it will not be later than the ordi- 7 time; it may be even earlier. I do see why it should not, if the House to work in a businesslike fashion.

1 true that the hon. Member for East hamptonshire, who is peculiarly ent in his criticisms of the conduct of lic business, said that it was outrageous that we should have had such long holi- days at Easter and Whitsuntide; and he desired that we should get up on 1st August. When the hon. Member is Leader of the House he will find that ideal, though a delightful one, is not easy to realise. It is possible to induce the House to take fairly long holidays at Easter and Whitsuntide, and especially when they meet, as this year they have done, in January; but it is not possible to induce the House to get up on 1st August.

*MR. CHANNING: On the contrary, I offered to stop longer, to help pass Bills like the Companies Bill. I thought the House ought to stop longer. My sugges- tion was that the great Bills should be taken earlier in the session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I demur from the hon. Gentleman on that point. The Bills we have taken earlier in the session are very important Bills—quite as im- portant as any that remain, so that the only difference between us is that the hon. Member would have taken the Com- panies Bill before the Housing of the Working Classes Bill. It is a matter on which the hon. Member and myself are hardly likely to agree.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): What about the point raised by the hon. Mem- ber for South-west Manchester, with respect to the funds of the Patriotic Commissioners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With all deference to my honourable friend, I do not think that it is very relevant to this discussion; but I think it is extremely likely that we shall be able to inform the House what our proposals are before the end of the session. But on that point I make no pledge. On the whole, I think the motion has not been unkindly received, even by the severest of our critics, and I hope that without a division we may now proceed to the ordinary business of the day.

RENT-CHARGE (IRELAND) BILL.

for Third Reading read, and ged.

on made and Question proposed, he Bill be re-committed in respect ew Clause (Exclusion of certain s and rent charges), and the ment to the Schedule."—(Mr. alfour.)

EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dun- ight they had a right to complain ay the House had been treated in of this Bill. When it was intro- it was understood that there would be a Report stage. There had been notice given of Amendments in respect of the matter on which it was now proposed to recommit the Bill. It was distinctly understood then that the Bill would be taken in the ordinary way on Report. There never was a Bill which more required to be subjected to the usual procedure of the House, for it was one of the most technical they had seen in this or any session of Parliament. He wished to refer to the point in regard to which it was proposed to recommit the Bill. It was a point on which the right hon. Gentleman got entirely into a mess when the Bill was in Committee. After refusing to accept his Amendment, the Attorney General for Ireland consented to consider the question before the Report stage. Now there was to be no Report stage. If they were to go into this question at all the House should have an opportunity of considering whether they preferred to keep the schedule intact and to strike out Clause 4, or to proceed in the way the right hon. Gentleman now proposed. For his part he would prefer the schedule intact, because it specified the words of the Act of 1872 to be repealed, while the repealing clause did not so specify the words. The House was to be reduced to this process if the Government would not consent to recommit the Bill indefinitely and generally, but he hoped that at least an Amendment would be consented to which would give the House an opportunity of deciding between the repeal clause contained in the Bill and the repeal portion of the schedule.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) moved to omit all words after "re-committed," in order to recommit the measure generally. The motion of the Chief Secretary, though not out of order, was very much out of ordinary form and routine. The motion of the right hon. Gentleman was to confine the effect of the re-committal to one clause only, and that a new clause. The records of Parliament could be searched in vain for the re-committal of a Bill on a new clause, and a new clause alone. The procedure now proposed to be adopted was altogether unprecedented. There were many Amendments the Irish Members had intended moving on the Report stage, some of them of vital importance. There was one in particular which the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General promised to consider, and he gave the House to infer that his decision would be brought up on Report. But when a Bill passed through Committee without Amendment the Report stage as a matter of convenience was abrogated. That had happened in this case, but how? On the very first day on which the Bill was under discussion the hon. and learned Member for North Louth proposed several Amendments. Those Amendments were not accepted, but a pledge was given by the Chief Secretary that he would frame a clause and submit it to the House on the Report stage. The Bill was discussed at considerable length, and then at the last moment the right hon. Gentleman suddenly declined to move the Amendments standing in his name, thus avoiding the Report stage. Such a contrivance to bar discussion ought not to be used. The Government had resorted to an extraordinary process, which as a rule was used only when certain matters arose between the Committee stage and the Third Reading. What was useful for the Government should also be useful for the Opposition, and therefore he hoped the House would agree to recommit the Bill in regard to matters. The Bill—a very technical one—had throughout been conducted in a very high-handed manner. There had been twenty divisions, four of which were on motions for the closure. On the Wednesday when the discussion had been closed, he drew the attention of the Chairman to the fact that by the question being put in the form it was two most valuable Amendments would be shut out of all discussion. The Chairman admitted that that would be so. If the Bill was recommitted generally those Amendments could be reproduced and argued, and it was therefore only fair that such a course should be adopted. One Amendment especially was absolutely essential, as it raised the tremendous question of the construction of the statute. The Government would not dare to apply the procedure now proposed to any other than Irish Bills; but the high-handed conduct of the Government would, to some extent, be remedied by recommitting the Bill as a whole. If the right hon. Gentleman agreed to this he could rest assured the Irish Members would not abuse in the slightest degree the power thereby given. Not a single reason could be urged against the Amendment except that the Government desired to bury discussion and prevent the bringing forward of arguments revealing the true intent of the Bill. The course the Government were taking amounted almost to a breach of faith, but he hoped the Chief Secretary would agree to concede the point now asked.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the words from the word 're-committed,' to the end of the question."—
(Mr. Swift MacNeill.)

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I rise strongly to support the Amendment, not merely on grounds particular to this Bill itself, but on general grounds relating to the procedure of this House. At a preceding stage of this Bill I felt it my duty to enter my most solemn and even vehement protest against the action of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the measure, and I assume that

The House appreciates the fact that the Government are to-night establishing an entirely new precedent. The motion that in the Third Reading a Bill should be recommitted is a motion not often made, but when the motion is made it is usually made in either of two contingencies—either when there is a general assent to the motion, or when the Government have found it necessary to make what is usually a literal correction in a Bill. There may be a third contingency in which such a motion would be justifiable, and that is when the Government find that through some oversight they have neglected to fulfil a pledge to any section of the House. But neither of these circumstances exists at the present moment. There is no unexpectedness in the matter; there is no mere literal change to be made; there is no general assent. What the Government have done is to employ what, without using the word offensively, I may describe as a device, the object being to escape from one of those stages of investigation and examination to which the wisdom of many centuries has decreed Bills should be subjected. In other words, the Government have adopted this device in order to do away with the Report stage of the Bill. That is a stage which has for centuries been regarded as one of the inevitable and necessary stages of a measure. I know of only two occasions on which that stage has been avoided. One was when the present Leader of the House was able to get an Education Bill through Committee without Amendment. That was a small Bill in many respects, and I do not intend to go back on the controversy. The other occasion was when a Bill was passed without Amendment through a Committee upstairs by a Member sitting on these benches, the Report stage being thus avoided. But I believe there was scarcely an evening for three months on which that hon. and learned Member was not indicted by hon. Gentlemen opposite for the unusual, unprecedented, and it was almost suggested, the indecent course he had adopted in getting the Bill through without accepting any Amendments, and I believe that that very act contributed finally to the rejection of the Bill in another place, because it was argued that a Bill passed through Committee in this indecently hasty way, without the acceptance of any rational Amendment, must have been so inadequately and scantily discussed that really that Chamber was only fulfilling its duty as a revising assembly in refusing to carry the Bill into law. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that the illustrious person who used this argument with such disastrous effect was the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, but now the very course which was used as an argument for rejecting that measure is being adopted by the right hon. Gentleman himself. This Bill is to be recommitted for the purpose of putting in a new clause which stood upon the Paper for several days. If the right hon. Gentleman could come down and say, "I want the Bill recommitted, because, since it passed through Committee, it has suddenly struck me that an improvement might be made in it," we would have nothing whatever to object to. But the right hon. Gentleman is in no such position, because the clause was upon the Paper for several days, and, in fact, was put there in fulfilment of a pledge given by the Government. We are therefore in this position: the Government are asking the House to take this unusual and wholly unprecedented course for the simple purpose of avoiding the Report stage. I strongly support my hon. and learned friend in the demand that if the Bill is recommitted at all it should be recommitted in its entirety, so that we may have the same rights of proposing Amendments as the Government now seek.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.E.) contended that something tantamount to a breach of faith had been committed by the Government. An undertaking was given across the floor of the House on the first night of the debate on this Bill that a new clause should be brought up later. It was not so brought up, but several days later it was placed on the Paper, and then at the last minute the Government forced the Bill through by a mechanical majority and amended their own hand. Instead of having the clause discussed in Committee they, in order to avoid the Report stage, had brought it forward in such a way that it could not be properly discussed. The arguments of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth on the first clause were such that they convinced the Government, and the Leader of the House promised a clause which should, if possible, meet the views which had been expressed. The clause duly appeared on the Paper, but to the surprise of everybody, after having suspended the twelve o'clock rule, the Government withdrew their own clause, and it was now brought in in its present form. Under these circumstances, he trusted the House would support the Irish Members in objecting to a course which was not only unprecedented in the procedure of the House, but which unquestionably was not in accordance with the spirit of fair play and equity towards a minority in the House. The Irish people were deeply interested in this Bill, because it affected an Irish fund, and therefore they were justified in protesting against the action of the Government as uncandid, unfair, and tantamount to a breach of faith, breaking the spirit, if not the letter, of their own promise in regard to the most controversial point in the whole Bill. The course suggested in the Amendment was one in accordance with Parliamentary procedure, and it was more convenient that instead of recommitting the Bill in respect of a single new clause, it should be recommitted in respect of all the clauses around which so much discussion raged, and in respect of which the Government had refused to accept any Amendments.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): Although not an Irish Member, I think it right to join in the protest which has been made against what I deem to be the unfair treatment of the House by the Government in connection with this measure. The intention of the Chief Secretary was, no doubt, to move this clause in Committee, but he had been successful in securing the rejection of every Amendment proposed by the Irish Members, and I suppose it occurred to him then that, if he abandoned for the time this intended clause, he would succeed in getting rid of the Report stage. The temptation, I imagine, was too strong to be resisted, and now he comes to the House asking to enjoy an exceptional position, in submitting a clause which ought to have been moved in Committee, while the rest of the House are virtually deprived of the opportunity of submitting other Amendments which they might desire to propose. I think it right to call the attention of the House to the fact that this method of procedure, call it by what name you will, appears to be part of the settled policy of the Government. It has happened in previous sessions, and it is happening now. It is sought to abolish the Report stage of Bills, avoid discussion, and to prevent Members exercising the full rights of membership of this House. Notably in this the case in regard to Bills which come from Standing Committees. The anomaly is greater in such cases, because the whole of the Members of the House, with the exception of those who are Members of the Standing Committees, are deprived of all opportunity of moving Amendments to Bills which are before the House. It is a quite common process for the Government, or anybody else in charge of a Bill, to move an Amendment on the final stage of the measure, but in such cases usually all Members of the House are placed on a footing of equality. But by this method the Government are curtailing the rights and privileges of Members of this House, and I think it is high time notice were taken of it, and that steps should be taken to prevent the continuance of such a policy in the future.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said it could not be imputed as a fault to the Government that they had succeeded in persuading the Committee of the whole House to pass their Bill without amendment. But although that complaint was not quite justified by all the circumstances of the case, he could see no good reason why Her Majesty's Government could not accept this Amendment. It seemed to him that having arrived at this stage, and the Government having found it necessary for their own purposes to recommit the Bill, he thought it was only fair that the recommitment should be a general one. He was most anxious that every one and even the smallest of the privileges of hon. Members of the House should be maintained, and should be brought into operation to show that they were being maintained. Perhaps hon. Members opposite might once again be in power, and then he thought the House might require every safeguard in case mischievous proposals were submitted. In regard to what had been said about Grand Committees, he thought that the practice of sending measures to Grand Committees was a great abuse. If a Bill was not good enough to stand the criticism of a Committee of the whole House, it was not good enough to introduce into the House at all.

Mr. Flynn.

He hoped the Government would agree to make the recommitment a general one. If they recommitted the measure for a specific purpose only they might find it necessary in the course of discussion to go into other matters. When he looked at the last line of the only clause in respect of which it was proposed to recommit the Bill, he found that it dealt with a matter of considerable importance. Sub-section 4 of the new clause provided that—

If that was the only thing—

MR. SPEAKER: These are questions which will be in order when the new clause is before the Committee.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said he only mentioned that to show that other questions might arise. He saw no reason why Her Majesty's Government should not accept this Amendment.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I do hope that if Her Majesty's Government do not accept this Amendment the House will carry it. I think it is quite a reasonable proposal, and Irish Members have great reason to complain of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government in this respect. Three-fourths of the Members from Ireland are bitterly opposed to this Bill, and they represent the feelings of their constituencies. The Irish Members opposing this measure consist of three-fourths of the entire representation of Ireland, and they are the only people who ought to attempt to correct bad legislation or promote good legislation for Ireland. Three-fourths of the Irish representatives are opposed to this Bill, and throughout its various stages they have sought to make various Amendments. On the discussion of Amendments which were moved to the very first section of the Bill there was a great deal of argument, and it was pointed out that some gross injustice and some gross anomalies would follow from the operation of the first section of the measure as it was originally introduced. Several hours were taken up in the discussion of that section, which struck very much at the root of the principle of the whole Bill, and in order to shorten the discussion and get rid of the difficulty the right hon. Gentleman opposite stood up and said he would bring up a clause on Report which would meet the difficulties which had been raised. For my part, I confess that I was quite satisfied with that assurance, and I believe all my hon. friends below the gangway were quite satisfied. Then the Committee passed on to other Amendments, and to other clauses in the Bill. A discussion arose about repealing one section, and a difficulty was pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Dundee. Again to shorten discussion and to hurry this Bill through the House in the face of the opposition of three-fourths of the Irish representatives, it was suggested that an amendment would be proposed and a new clause would be brought in by the Government dealing with the point in dispute upon the report stage. We were also quite satisfied with that assurance. Upon the fourth night of the discussion of this revolutionary and confiscatory proposal what happened? In the first place the twelve o'clock rule was suspended. We all know that the suspension of this rule drives a great many reasonable men away from the House, and it is an effectual way of throwing a wet blanket over the business. I make no secret of saying that legislation in that manner after twelve o'clock upon serious matters is a mere farce and delusion. Having closed the Bill on the fourth night no new clause is brought up and no Report stage becomes necessary, and by this ingenious strategy—and I believe in calling a spade a spade—the report stage of a very contentious Bill was avoided by Her Majesty's Government in order to force this obnoxious Bill down the throats of the unwilling Irish people. And now the Government come up with this new clause and invite its discussion. For the sake of fair play to hon. Members from Ireland, I hope hon. Gentlemen opposite will support the Amendment of my hon. friend the Member for South Donegal if the Government do not accept it, and thus allow Irish Members the benefit of having, as it were, a Report stage of this Bill.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I hope the Government will consent to make this recommitment of the Bill one of a general character. During the discussion of this measure we have seen the most reasonable Amendments constantly rejected. Surely it is not right to lay down that whatever the results may be or whatever injustice may follow, a measure must be carried verbatim et literatim in the particular form in which it is presented to the House. What is the House of Commons for if it is not to be allowed to make even the smallest and most reasonable amendment in the Bill? I disagree with the hon. Gentleman opposite who has stated that there is not enough intelligence on this side of the House to draw up such an Amendment as may be necessary to improve this Bill. The fact of the matter is that it is not a want of intelligence on this side of the House, but the difficulty is a want of scruple on the other side of the House. Unfortunately, this is the case also with another Bill. It was only the other day that a Minister said upstairs that an Amendment should not be allowed because, if it were accepted, the Report stage would follow. Ever since the commencement of this Parliament the Government have tried to prevent Bills being altered in order to save the Report stage. I trust that the Government, from a sense of ordinary justice and fair play, will allow Irish Members to discuss the rest of the Bill in the light of this clause, for which it is now proposed to re-commit the Bill. It appears to me that we are entering upon courses that are dangerous and which are verging upon being of an unconstitutional character. Of course, the Government have acted according to the rules of the House in what they have done, but it is for them to consider and decide whether, in keeping themselves strictly in order, they have not transgressed the rules of fairness which ought to govern every Administration.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I have to thank the hon. Member opposite for the support he has given us upon this Bill. The hon. Member for King's Lynn has reproached us in regard to our incapacity to persuade hon. Members opposite to support our Amendments, but how is that possible when hon. Members opposite were absent during the discussions, and only appeared when the division bell rang? I never met with a debater in Committee who was able to persuade hon. Members to forsake the smoke room, the tea room, or the terrace by the reasonableness of his Amendment, and we never had any large body of hon. Members opposite listening to us when the Bill was discussed, except on the last night when the rule was suspended. On many occasions I counted the number of Members present on the benches opposite during the discussions, and they generally numbered about six. You cannot persuade the party opposite as to the reasonableness of any Amendments when there are only six of them present. It has been said that we have had a good many cases during the administration of the present Government of Bills being forced through the Committee verbatim et literatim for the purpose of avoiding the Report stage. In the case of this Bill a totally new practice has been instituted. In all previous cases, as far as my memory carries me, when a Bill was forced through the Committee without the alteration of a word or a comma, it was forced through on the ground that the Minister in charge maintained that no reasonable Amendment had been proposed by the Opposition. That was the only ground which could be put forward. What is the present case? That is not the ground in the present instance, because on the very first night of our debate the Government admitted that a reasonable Amendment had been proposed, and they promised to bring up a new clause during the Committee stage of the Bill. Although at a later date they refused all our Amendments, they admitted that upon this particular occasion the point raised was worthy of their consideration, and would be dealt with during the Report stage. But what have the Government done now? In this respect they have started an absolutely new practice in this House. Having promised to meet these difficulties, when they saw themselves in sight of the promised land of no Report stage, they immediately withdrew their promises, and they sought by a dodge or a piece of strategy to sweep away and abolish the Report stage, because they saw that these Amendments could be put in by a recommittal of the Bill. I say that is an absolutely unheard-of practice. Hitherto, when the Government have admitted the necessity of an Amendment, they have been bound to deal with it in Committee or upon Report stage. This practice is one which may have very extraordinary developments. What is there to prevent a Radical Government doing the same

Mr. Herbert Lewis.

What is there to prevent a Government admitting that five, six, or seven Amendments may be necessary in Committee, and saying they will consider them on the Report stage, and then passing the Bill through without an Amendment, and thus escaping the Report stage by proposing a recommitment of the Bill? This is a deliberate attempt, for the first time in the history of the House of Commons, to cheat hon. Members, because we are a small minority, out of the rights which the Standing Orders of this House have given to us. That is a serious charge to make, but it is a perfectly true charge, and if this practice is persisted in it may be the starting point of an absolutely new practice. We have lost one or two stages of Bills already. The First Reading of a Bill is always taken under the ten minutes rule, and we are now threatened with a total abolition of the Report stage. If the present procedure is tolerated we shall soon be within measurable distance of a condition of things when there will only be the Second Reading and Committee stages of a Bill, with the possibility of a recommitment. I am surprised to see Conservative Members and a Conservative Government taking such an active part in this mode of procedure. It has been said that at a time may come when you will do what you accused the Volksraad of doing—namely, the flinging down of a Bill upon the Table of the House and passing a resolution, and then claiming that that resolution has the power of law. I shall not be surprised if I live to see the day when the Government will walk down to this House, place a Bill on the Table, and move "That this Bill be now made the law of the land." I think it is quite time that hon. Members of this House realised the position into which they are drifting. I do not think it will be in order now to deal with the nature of the recommitment, or discuss the question as to whether there ought to be a complete recommitment of the Bill. The Government motion is a curious one, and it reads as follows—

"To commit the Bill in respect of a new clause, and an Amendment to the schedule."

I think that motion is slovenly drafted, because we do not know what the Amendment is. I should like to know, when a Bill is recommitted in respect of an Amendment, are we entitled to move any other Amendment? Is the Bill recommitted entirely, or are we confined to the Amendment which actually stands on the Paper?

*MR. SPEAKER: Discussion is confined to the clause standing on the Paper.

MR. DILLON: What I am not clear about is whether after the Bill is recommitted we shall be empowered to move any other Amendment. Supposing we were to recommit the Bill in respect to a particular clause, would it be open to us to move any Amendment to that clause? When we recommit this Bill in respect to a particular Amendment have we the right to amend that Amendment? What I have to say in reference to the nature of the Government proposal will, of course, more fittingly come when the proposal of the Government is made. I have only this further remark to make, and it is that I distinctly understood the right hon. Gentleman to promise that this matter would be considered and dealt with on the Report stage, and as regards the words of the Chief Secretary there is no mistake about them, for he distinctly promised that the new clause would be dealt with in Committee at the end of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.) said that the question referred to was the repealing of a certain clause under the Act of 1872, and what was promised was that if it was not already repealed a proposal to that effect would be made by the Government. Upon looking carefully into the matter he found that Clause 32 was repealed, and there was no necessity to introduce another clause.

MR. DILLON said that what the Government had done on the present occasion had never been done in the House of Commons before, and upon that ground he strongly supported the Amendment of his hon. friend the Member for South Donegal. He hoped they would obtain the support of all hon. Members opposite who did not wish to see the procedure upon Bills in the House deprived of certain safeguards.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I may say that my own personal view is that I do not like the practice of passing Bills through Grand Committee and then simply asking the House to pass the Third Reading, when the House as a whole has had no opportunity of doing more than give its general assent. But it cannot be urged in the case of this Bill that the House has had no opportunity of discussing its details. For four nights we have listened to the same old arguments, dressed up in the same old words, upon the details of the Bill, forming the most striking example of Parliamentary endurance that my recollection of House of Commons procedure furnishes. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have thought fit to attack the Government for what they choose to regard as something in the nature of a breach of faith, or a violation of the privileges of the House. One would suppose that hon. Gentleman opposite were an oppressed minority, struggling against an unscrupulous and tyrannical Government; but the circumstances are exactly reversed. All the patience has been on our side, and all the wrong has been suffered by us. I do not wish to enter into any recriminations. I have had countless bargains across the floor of the House with hon. Gentlemen opposite when I was in much more acute political antagonism with them than I now am, and I have never had reason for complaint until the other night. I am perfectly certain hon. Gentlemen do not think they have agreed to and broken any bargain, or that they have any suspicion of an arrangement with the Government regarding the conduct of the Committee on this Bill; but the impression left on my mind is that the hon. and learned Member for North Louth made a proposal which is now substantially embodied in the clause on the Paper, and suggested that, in consideration of the Government adopting his view, the proceedings on the Bill would be shortened, and he went so far as to suggest that they might even finish that night, and that the proposal of the Chief Secretary might be discussed on the Thursday. But the hon. Member for East Mayo then said, as was quite true, that the hon. and learned Member for North Louth had no right to bind the whole of the party. I then quite recognised that a too rigid interpretation ought not to be put on the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth, and that the debate might go on the Wednesday, and that we would be able to bring up the new clause at a convenient hour on Thursday. As far as I know, nothing more was said, and the matter was left there. I do not wish to use the word "obstruction" at all, nor to have any controversy with hon. Gentlemen opposite, but the very moment the arrangement or the supposed arrangement was concluded they began to discuss the Bill with an assiduity, a perseverance and a power even of repetition which carried the discussion of the Bill not only over Tuesday and Wednesday and Thursday, but until about half-past two o'clock on the Monday night. Thus, in making our concession to the hon. and learned Member for North Louth the Government have got no consideration. We had no desire to see this Amendment introduced. We offered it for value, and we never got the value. Therefore, if there is any complaint, and I am very far from making any complaint, it is on the side of the Government, and not on the side of hon. Members opposite.

DR. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): We have just listened to one of the most extraordinary speeches which the House has heard during this session. The right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to criticise the speeches of the Irish Members on this very important Bill, and to say that they were repetitions. I should have thought that the more honourable course for the Government to adopt would be, as preliminary to the dissolution, to make it known to all concerned that the Tory Government—the strongest and most intelligent ever seen in this House—were granting relief to the Irish landlords. That would be making a clean breast of it. I must protest against the manner in which the Government have endeavoured to avoid discussion on the Report stage of this Bill.

"(1) Section one of this Act shall not apply to any annual sum charged upon land the fee simple of which has after the creation of such charge and before the thirteenth day of April one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six been conveyed to a purchaser on a sale.

"(2) Sections three and four of this Act shall not apply to any tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission out of hereditaments the fee simple of which has after the tenth day of August one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two and before the twelfth day of May one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine been conveyed to a purchaser on a sale.

"(3) For the purpose of showing that this section does not apply a statutory declaration or such other evidence as the Land Commission may require shall be prima facie evidence.

"(4) This section shall not extend to a mortgage or a marriage or other family settlement or arrangement."—(Mr. G. W. Balfour.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the clause be read a second time."

MR. FLYNN: May I ask the Chief Secretary to explain what is meant by this clause?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. Balfour, Leeds, Central): The principle of the clause is that purchasers purchasing after certain dates may be supposed to have purchased with notice of change, and consequently they should not be entitled to benefit under the Bill. There are really three parties to be considered: the vendor, the purchaser of the estate, and the Church Fund. Strictly speaking, it is to the vendor that the benefit should go, but that is not possible, and it remains, therefore, to decide whether the Church Fund or the purchaser shall have the benefit. The clause provides that the benefit shall be given to the Church Fund rather than to the purchaser. The date mentioned in the first sub-section is the date on which the Land Bill of 1896 was introduced, when notice was given to all and sundry that the Government proposed to reduce the annuities to be discharged by the Land Commission from fifty-two years to forty-five. The second date mentioned in the second sub-section is the date of the introduction of the Tithe Rent Bill last year, which might be taken as notice to purchasers that the change we are now making by this Bill would be introduced. I think there is a great deal to be said for the proposal of the Member for North Louth, and I recognised that when I undertook to put down this Amendment; but I think it is rather doubtful if the additional gain to the Church Fund will be balanced by the introduction of a complicating provision.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman seems to be awaking for the first time to the fact that the complications of this Bill are a matter of some concern. The Bill is complicated from beginning to end. The proper way to have dealt with the subject would have been by a Bill of one short simple clause making a charge on the Church Fund of a million and a half of money to be expended among the Irish landlords. That would carry on the proposal in the present Bill without any complications, and that has been the practice adopted with reference to other charges on the Fund, such as the charge for Intermediate Education and the Congested Districts Board.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is now discussing the whole Bill.

MR. DILLON: I am not discussing the whole Bill. I am merely referring to the complaint of the Chief Secretary that a fresh complication has been introduced. It is equivalent to suggesting that by throwing a bucket of water into the sea there is danger of creating a flood.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is reverting to a discussion of the Bill, which he says is complicated. He must confine himself to the one clause before the Committee.

MR. DILLON: I have no desire to enter on a discussion of the whole Bill at all. I was pointing out, in reply to an argument used by the right hon. Gentleman himself, that really an additional complication is of no matter. May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he has passed over altogether Sub-section 4, which I confess I am absolutely unable to understand. It says: "This section shall not extend to a mortgage or a marriage"—

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: "Or other family settlement or arrangement."

MR. DILLON: I am still in doubt as to its purport. What has a mortgage got to do with a tithe rent-charge? The Attorney General for Ireland laughs scornfully, but I am only an ignorant layman and really I cannot understand the meaning of this sub-section. It is all very well for Gentlemen learned in the law to sneer, but any ordinary Member of the House of Commons is perfectly entitled to the explanation I now ask for.

MR. ATKINSON: The sub-section provides for the exclusion of a mortgage or a marriage or other family settlement from this section. It would be ridiculous because a mortgage was made in 1872 that the owner of the land should be prevented from having his tithe fixed now, or that the existence of a family settlement should have a similar result.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) said he only rose to ask a question, but as the Ministerial Bench was empty he did not see the use of putting his question at that time, and would therefore defer it.

MR. FLYNN said that as he understood the clause it would not apply to the annuities and tithe rent-charges before 1896. It applied to the annuities and tithe rent-charges created after the 13th April, 1896. The exclusion could not apply to those who purchased under the Land Purchase Act, because the Act of 1886 made their position clear, but it did apply to a section of purchasers to whom attention had been drawn in the earlier stages of the Bill—namely, those persons who purchased the holdings over the heads of the tenants who were seeking to purchase under the 40th section of the Land Purchase Act. They got the benefit of the reduction of the tithe rent-charge, as also did insurance companies who foreclosed upon the estate of a tenant proprietor who got into difficulties and became the owners of it. Those surely should be excluded. There was another class of purchaser who ought also to be excluded. Cases like that of Lord Ardilaun, for instance, who would get all the benefit of the reduction of the tithe rent-charge, because he purchased his estate after the date mentioned in the section. But the estate was purchased subject to the tithe rent-charge, and with the full knowledge that that charge was a certain sum, and the owner never supposed there would be another large reduction of the tithe rent-charge. Yet it was intended to give this wealthy family—who purchased the property to obtain a status in the country, more than anything else—the full benefits of the reduction, or, in other words, to present them, out of the Irish Church Fund, with seven years tithe rent-charge. Was it reasonable that Lord Ardilaun should get the benefit of an Act which, whether it was good or bad, was certainly never intended to relieve people of that class? The tenant purchasers could not be interfered with, they were not damnified in any way, but there were many estates to which it was thought and hoped the 40th section would apply to which it had not applied, and the poor unfortunate tenants had been chivied from one place to another. There were some cases where the offer of the tenant had not been considered enough, and another person, having the knowledge of the amount the tenant had offered, was allowed to purchase the property over his head, with the full knowledge of what the tithe-rent charge was, and he also got the benefit of this Act.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Mr. FLAVIN, Kerry, N.). House counted, and, forty Members being found present—

MR. FLYNN said he was convinced that the clause did not meet the views of the hon. Member for North Louth, who had taken objection on the last occasion, and therefore he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

*THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that before the Amendment could be moved the clause must be read a second time.

MR. FLYNN said that large land-owners were certainly not entitled to the benefits of the Act which had been introduced for the purpose of assisting poor landlords, and under the circumstances he hoped the Committee would not pass the clause.

*SIR J. COLOMB said that he would now take the opportunity of putting a question to which he had referred earlier in the evening. The tenants who had purchased under the Ashbourne Act, and were paying the tithe rent-charge, would by the operation of this Bill be excluded from any benefit they would otherwise obtain if the clause passed, and if that was so they would not feel any obligation to hon. Gentlemen opposite through whose attitude the clause was initiated. If the clause was going to operate in that way he asked that it might be withdrawn.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said that the hon. Gentleman had stated that any tenant purchaser who had purchased under the 40th Clause of the Land Purchase Act, and at the same time had not redeemed the tithe, would lose all benefit under the Bill. He did not know there were many of those cases, although undoubtedly there were some. The general practice had been to redeem the tithe at the time of purchase. He had no desire to press the clause, which he had only brought forward because he had given an undertaking to do so. If hon. Gentlemen opposite were of opinion that there was no benefit in it he should certainly not press it.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL thought the clause was a good one in principle, although, when it had been read a second time, there were one or two Amendments to which he should call attention. He believed there would be a great deal of disappointment in Ireland if the clause were to be withdrawn, and although it was not so perfect as he would have liked to have seen it he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would proceed to the Second Reading of the clause.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said there was no use in proceeding with the Second Reading of the clause after the expression of opinion opposite.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL said as he understood the remarks of the hon. Gentleman below the gangway, he had no desire to withdraw the clause altogether.

MR. FLYNN disclaimed any intention to object to the clause. All he was doing was pointing out a few of its defects.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS was of opinion that this was not a question for Irish Members alone. The clause as it stood increased the security of the British taxpayer. Though he should support the clause as it stood, he should also support the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Cork, for the reason that he failed to understand why those who purchased a month or two ago should be placed in a better position than those who purchased in earlier years. He thought that the clause might be accepted by everybody, but at the same time hon. Members had a right to endeavour to amend what appeared to be a very great blot upon it. Why should those who purchased within the last few months be placed in a better position than those who purchased ten or fifteen years ago? The dividing line ought to be the date of the Bill.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.), who was indistinctly heard, said very few of those who purchased under the Land Purchase Bill would be affected, for the reason that it was the invariable practice of the Land Commission to take twenty years purchase for the tithes, and it was only in very few cases that the tenant proprietors were liable for the tithe rent-charge. With regard to the Amendments which had been made, they were naturally anxious to preserve the fund from being frittered away for purposes for which it was not intended.

Question put and agreed to.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL said he had given notice of an Amendment which was not on the Paper. His right hon. and learned friend would recollect that the Tithe Rent-charge Act applied not only to fee simple land but also to what was described in the Tithe Rent-charge Act as equivalent estates in land. The clause in this Bill as it now stood would only apply to fee simple land, and the object of his Amendment was to make it apply also to equivalent estates.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 2, after the word 'which,' to insert the words 'or any estate equivalent to a perpetual estate or interest within the meaning of 1 and 2 Vic., c. 109.'"—(Serjt. Hemphill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ATKINSON said he did not see any objection to his hon. friend's Amendment, but at the same time the words of the Amendment would have to be altered.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL said if the right hon. Gentleman could suggest more appropriate words he would not at all object.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. FLYNN, in moving the Amendment standing in his name, said that he thought the insertion of the date was a matter that would give the benefits of the Act to those for whom they were not intended. Those who purchased after 13th April, 1896, would get the benefit of the reduction of the tithe rent-charge by seven years instalments. He was anxious to get to the Third Reading of the Bill, and therefore he would content himself with moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 2, to leave out from the word charge' to the word 'been,' in line 4."—(Mr. Dillon.)

MR. G. W. BALFOUR, in opposing the Amendment, stated that a purchaser of an estate must be assumed to have had full notice of the charges upon it. In 1896 the principle was laid down that the term of fifty-two years would be reduced to forty-five, and those who purchased estates subsequently expected that reduction. That was a consideration which ought to be taken into account. It appeared to him that all the arguments that might be urged against the clause as a whole might also be urged against this limitation of the clause.

MR. DILLON said the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman was very singular. He said that on the Second Reading of the Bill in 1896 he stated in the course of his speech that it was the intention of the Government to alter the condition with regard to the fifty-two annual instalments, and to knock off seven years, and that therefore a purchaser coming after that date had due notice of the intention of the Government. A more preposterous objection never was submitted to the House of Commons. He would illustrate the absurdity of the position. He held in his hand the famous Treasury Memorandum with respect to tithe rent-charge in Ireland, which was issued on 19th August, 1895, and signed by R. W. Hanbury, the present Secretary to the Treasury. That was far more important than the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland in that House. The Memorandum pointed out that it would be most unjust and unreasonable to expect that the fifty-two years instalments would be reduced. The thing was dealt with in an argumentative fashion, and the Treasury put down its foot and announced in a solemn form in a Memorandum that they would not reduce the fifty-two years instalments. The Treasury gave reasons, which he need not again read out, why it would be unjust and inexpedient to consent to this reduction. The position of the right hon. Gentleman was this: although the British Treasury issued this solemn Memorandum, the speech he subsequently made threw overboard the Treasury, and announced that the then Government had the intention of reducing the instalments. That was a perfectly preposterous contention, and he could not understand how the right hon. Gentleman proposed to base so important a clause, or provision in this new clause, on such a flimsy argument as that. He knew himself two cases that would be affected by this clause, and there might be others. There had not been many sales of land on a large scale since 1896. The cases he referred to were connected with the estates of Lord Ardilaun and the Duke of Devonshire. This proposal of the right hon. Gentleman would have the effect of exempting Lord Ardilaun from the provisions of the section—in other words, of giving Lord Ardilaun the advantage of the clause. That was a very extraordinary thing to do for Lord Ardilaun, but it said a great deal for the Christian charity of the right hon. Gentleman. Lord Ardilaun was worth a million and a half of money.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: More than that.

MR. DILLON: Say a couple of millions. He purchased a large estate in Killarney, but the extraordinary thing was that he also purchased the Daily Express with part of his money, and it was pouring out on the right hon. Gentleman the most vile abuse. The right hon. Gentleman was insisting on this proviso in spite of the fact that Lord Ardilaun devoted a large sum of money to opposing him. He (Mr. Dillon) trusted that his hon. friend would persist in the Amendment and go to a division upon it.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL said that this Amendment was really important. The Amendment could not possibly affect those who purchased under the Act of 1896, because their tithe rent-charge was fixed under that Act. Therefore, the section about reducing the term from fifty-two years to forty-five years would not apply to them, because they were not interested in annuities terminable at the end of fifty-two years. If they looked at the Act they would see how the matter stood. The Land Purchase Act of 1887, in Section 15, provided that the Land Commission might, if they thought it expedient, order the redemption of any tithe rent-charge at a price to be fixed by the Land Commission, and that they might also order (Sub-section 3) that any such redemption of tithe rent-charge payable to the Commission should be made, without the previous consent of the Commissioners, to the Treasury. The Act of 1896, Section 37, provided that where the Land Commission, in pursuance of Section 15 of the Land Act of 1887, ordered the redemption of tithe rent-charge at a price of not less than twenty times the amount of such tithe rent-charge, the consent of the Treasury should not be required for such redemption. The Act further provided that the foregoing enactment should not apply to any annual sum payable under Section 32 of the Irish Church Act, 1869, and as amended by any other Act; but the Land Commission might order the redemption of such tithe rent-charge at a sum calculated on the basis of the annual sum, being for the term of fifty-five instead of fifty-two years. That where, he apprehended, the forty-two years period was got. Any tenant who bought under that Act had the tithe redeemed on these terms and was subject only to the annual charge, which was terminable at the expiration of forty-two years and not fifty-two years. He thought that completely disposed of any objection there could be to this Amendment.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Captain Donelan and Mr.
 Patrick O'Brien.

MR. FLYNN moved to omit the words "the twelfth day of May one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine" in order to insert "the passing of this Act." The section was to apply to all rent-charges created since a certain date and before the 12th May, 1899. The reason given for selecting the latter date was that last year the Government stated their intention of bringing in a Tithes Bill, and therefore the benefit of the reduction of the tithe rent-charge should be given to all who purchased after that date. The announcement of the introduction of a Tithes Bill was made by the Chief Secretary, who was not even a member of the Cabinet; and surely it was stretching the doctrine of Ministerial responsibility much too far to argue that that was a sufficient reason for saying that those who purchased since that date should receive the benefits of the Act. How did the purchasers know the present Government would remain in power, or that, after their experience in regard to the agricultural rates, they would have the temerity to go on with such a measure as the present, which was nothing more nor less than taking money from a public fund and handing it over to the Irish landlords? The Nationalist Members desired to limit the harm to be done by the Bill as much as possible, and to give the benefits to purchasers since May, 1899, was an altogether unnecessary extension of the provision. The only argument put forward in defence of the proposal was that on that date the Chief Secretary made a speech in reference to a Bill which was not proceeded with. But how many people read the right hon. Gentleman's speeches? It was absurd to suppose that the whole of the population of Ireland read the speeches of the Chief Secretary, and, while the Bill bristled with absurdities, this topped everything. The Amendment was very reasonable and moderate, and should commend itself to the Committee, even if it did not to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 8, to leave out from the word 'before,' to the word 'been,' in line 9, and insert the words 'the passing of this Act,' instead thereof."—(Mr. Flynn.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said the principle of the clause depended entirely on the fact that on a certain date purchasers of land received notice that it was the intention of the Government to make certain changes which were included in this Bill. It had been urged that he attached undue importance to his speeches, but when he made the announcement referred to he was expressing not merely his own view, but the deliberate opinion of the Cabinet on the subject. Under those circumstances it was absurd to maintain that purchasers of land would not purchase having regard to what the Government intended to do in respect of tithes.

MR. DILLON contended that the principle laid down by the Chief Secretary, that the announcement of the intentions of the Government was to be taken as governing the price of a commodity, was one entirely unheard of. To say that if a Minister made an announcement of an intention of the Government that was absolute proof that that intention would be carried out was most extraordinary. The fate of Governments was very uncertain, and even the present Administration with its great majority had broken down in the attempt to carry out certain intentions they had announced with much more solemnity than was ever the case with regard to tithes. Not one in a hundred of the English Members of the House would ever have remembered that such an announcement had been made. In regard to the Education Bill an announcement was made in the early days of the Government, when they had the world before them, and a majority of 150 behind them, but although the Prime Minister and the Leader of the House pledged themselves to that Bill it was never carried into law. It was now maintained that because in the fifth year of the existence of the Government, when they were beginning to become decrepit with age, the Chief Secretary announced that a certain Bill would be introduced, every purchaser of land in Ireland was solemnly warned of the intention of the Government and increased his price. A more grotesque or flimsy argument has never been placed before the House of Commons in support of or in opposition to any Amendment. He was not supporting this proposal because it was directed against the landlords. As a matter of fact, it would hit more tenants and proprietors than landlords, but he supported it because he believed it was fair and reasonable. The right hon. Gentleman was exhibiting the same unreasonable, irrational, and cantankerous spirit that he had shown throughout the whole course of the debates. On a previous occasion it was said there had been an honourable understanding arrived at that the Committee stage should be obtained on a certain evening, and that he had been guilty of a breach of that understanding. That was not the fact, because at the time he pointed out that the hon. and learned Member for North Louth spoke only for himself, and that so far as he (Mr. Dillon) and his friends were concerned, the date would depend a great deal on the attitude taken up by the Government in regard to concessions. No concessions were made, and the debates were therefore prolonged. They were now being met in exactly the same spirit, and it was evident that no Amendment whatever coming from the Irish benches was to be accepted.

e 5, line 8, to leave out from f line to end of schedule.”—(Mr.

MUND ROBERTSON (Dun-the right hon. Gentleman to y it was proposed to leave out ls. He wished the Committee and that this appeal which it proposed to exclude was the same in substance as the Clause 4. He put it to the Attorney General in Committee whether the effect of Clause 4 was not to repeal the whole of Section 7, except in regard to the definition of the word “owner,” which it was necessary to retain. He understood the Attorney General to accept that view as being correct. If that was so, what they did in the schedule was exactly what he suggested would be the effect of the original clause in the Bill. If there was to be any choice he thought the words of the schedule were the best.

MR. ATKINSON replied that this was simply a consequential Amendment rendered necessary by the introduction of the new clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported ; as amended, considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

*MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): The English and Scottish Members of the House have been content for the most part to leave the discussion of the details of this measure to hon. Gentlemen who come from the other side of St. George's Channel ; and if the Bill were confined in most of its provisions to the question of lay tithe, mischievous as I believe them to be in principle and indefensible in method, I for one should have been satisfied with recording a silent vote against the third reading. Lay tithe always has been, and is still, a variable quantity. It is for the most part, at any rate, a payment made by one set of private persons to another ; and any scheme of readjustment is a matter in which the taxpayers of Great Britain have very little direct concern. But when we come to the provisions of the Bill which deal with the ecclesiastical tithe they present a totally different aspect. The admitted effect—and I take my stand on the statements made by the Chief Secretary himself—of the provisions of this Bill, in so far as ecclesiastical tithe is concerned, is that they will involve a considerable immediate and a much larger prospective encroachment on the fund of the Irish Church ; a fund created by the Legislature, for the administration of which it cannot divest itself of responsibility, which was solemnly dedicated by Parliament to the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering in Ireland, and which is at this moment the only security for very large advances made at the risk of the Imperial taxpayer out of the Imperial Exchequer. I am, therefore, under no necessity to apologise—although this seems at first sight a purely Irish question—for asking the attention of the House for a few moments to this aspect of the Bill. The Irish Church Fund will be invaded, and will be curtailed in two distinct ways if this measure passes into law. I apologise for repeating propositions which have been so frequently to the House in the course of this Bill. In the first place, where tithe rent-charge has been in effect redeemed, the Bill proposes to reduce the number of years during which the purchase annuity has to run from fifty-two to forty years, or in other words, by some small like one-seventh, with the acknowledged consequence that after a certain lapse of time there will be a loss to the value of the Church Fund amounting to 1½ million. This fact has been admitted by the Chief Secretary himself. It was the term of fifty-two years, for which it is now proposed to substitute forty years originally fixed ? It was fixed by the Irish Church Act of 1869, and when the proposal was made by Mr. Gladstone that the Irish tithe-payer—which course, means practically the Irish landlord—should be allowed to redeem perpetual annual charge by an annuity spread over fifty-two years, it was loudly denounced, and by no one more vehemently than by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, not that it imposed an undue burden upon the Irish landlord, but, on the other hand, because it involved a serious injustice to the Irish tenant. It was said by the right hon. Gentleman that it was a unique extension of sacrilege and bribery—said because it proposed to divert an ecclesiastical fund to the relief of the Irish landlords ; bribery, because it proposed that act of sacrilege to conciliate a class off the opposition of the landlords, the disestablishment of the Church. Twenty years later, in 1872, when there was the amplest opportunity for all concerned to consider the position, if need be, revise it, the arrangement of 1869 with regard to the redemption of tithe, and the number of years over which the annuity was to be spread, was deliberately renewed by Parliament. And now, after the lapse of more than thirty years, when the land has changed hands over and over again, when those who were responsible as public trustees for the administration of the Church Fund had the best right to believe that they had a permanent basis of settlement, Parliament is asked to set the matter aside. And upon what plea ? Upon the most unsubstantial and illusory plea I have ever heard advanced in a public discussion—namely, that not only

ies immediately concerned, the lands on the one side and the representa-s of the Church on the other, but the Executive Government of the day and the Houses of Parliament were, first in and again in 1872, the victims of a cal blunder. I should very much e to know what would have been said instead of the proposal being to reduce term of fifty-two years to forty-five s, it was, in consequence of some ge in the rate of interest and the e of money, to raise the term from -two years to fifty-nine years. Hon.
nbers opposite would have come down the House clothed in the panoply landlord logic, and declared that a inequitable interference with the ights of property and sanctity of contract had never been suggested, and the very foundations of the House would have been rocked by the storm of indignation which the proposal would have aroused. I pass from that feature in this measure to the second branch, that is the proposal for dealing with the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge.
More mischievous in principle, and certainly not less injurious in the result, is this second proposal—the project to make the annual payment of ecclesiastical tithe vary according to the scale of judicial rents. I must point out to the House the fact that prior to 1872 ecclesiastical tithe, like lay tithe, was a variable quantity; but in 1872 ecclesiastical tithe was by the deliberate act of Parliament transformed into a fixed annual payment.
Am I to be told that that was not a bargain? I gather from some statements which fell from the Chief Secretary that he is prepared to dispute that proposition on the extraordinary and, indeed, unintelligible ground that there was hardly any debate on the Bill of 1872 during its passage through Parliament. I say, on the contrary, that in the fact that this proposal, completely transforming the character of ecclesiastical tithe, passed in comparative silence through both Houses, you have the best possible evidence that the two parties concerned—the trustees of the Church Fund on the one hand and the tithe-payers on the other—had by negotiations come to an agreement which they proposed should be ratified in the form of a solemn statute. And there was good reason why both sides should have arrived at such an arrangement. On the one side the administrators of the Church Fund may have thought it was an enormous advantage to them to have a fixed income which they could forecast five or six years in advance, instead of an income which was always fluctuating according to the prices of agricultural produce. On the other hand, the landlords had an equally good reason for entering into the bargain, for the prices of agricultural produce had been rising, and continued to rise for four or five years after 1872, and there was every reason to expect that the prices would go on rising. Therefore a fixed charge on the land would be more favourable to them than a varying tithe.

Whatever were the reasons which influenced the minds of the two parties to this arrangement, the arrangement was made with the sanction of Parliament, and it has lasted for thirty years, and has regulated ever since the transactions of all persons interested in Irish land. Why is it to be ripped up? What is the emergency? What the justification for rescinding after an interval of twenty-eight years a solemn statutory compact?
The Government are well advised in not defending the proposal on the ground of the fall in prices. For the possible rise on the one hand, and the possible fall on the other of agricultural prices are the very contingencies to guard against which this statutory arrangement was entered into. Supposing, instead of the price of wheat and oats, which are the two staple products according to which the tithe rent-charge varied, having fallen, prices had continuously risen and the Government had now proposed to tear up the bargain of 1872 on the ground that it had proved injurious to the Irish Church Fund, what would have been the indignation of the landlords! In truth this proposal to relieve the Irish tithe-payer of the sum which he had contracted to pay is but the culmination and the climax of a series of measures, for which this Parliament is responsible, for the subvention and relief of particular classes and interests at the expense of the community at large.
The series began in 1896, when the English and Scotch landlords were relieved of half their rates. It continued in 1897, when a large bounty was given to denominational schools to enable them to compete in the race with the Board schools. It was further developed in 1898 when the Irish landlords, in order to buy their assent, which is not to be had for nothing, to a scheme for the establishment of local government in Ireland, which Lord Salisbury had prophetically denounced as even worse than Home Rule, were relieved of their one-half of the poor rate. In 1899—these things occur under the present dispensation with the monotonous regularity of the seasons—there was the proposal to relieve the ecclesiastical tithe receivers in England. Now, in 1900, lest any session of this Parliament should be left undistinguished by one of these enterprises in which a particular interest is championed by the Executive Government and by the Parliamentary majority of the day as against the community at large, we have the proposal to relieve the Irish tithe-payer. Yes, but this Bill, although it has, in common with its predecessors, the common characteristic of relieving one class at the expense of the whole, has one development on which I must congratulate the Government—a peculiar feature of its own. Hitherto in 1896, 1898, and 1899, when you have been granting these doles and endowments to particular classes—listening to the cries of the unfortunate or rather satisfying the clamours of the importunate—you have, in relieving your privileged class of the burden which it previously had to bear, made good to the fund depleted the loss which it would have sustained. You have made it good out of the Imperial taxation to the local rates. Far be it from me to suggest that the deficiency that is going to be created in the Irish Church Fund by the operation of this Bill should be met by Imperial taxation. That is not my proposition. I denounce the whole thing as an injustice, and as absolutely unnecessary and inexcusable. But the fact remains that this is the first occasion that the State has come and said as between two persons, the one of whom was a debtor and the other a creditor, the one bound to pay to the other by agreement and by statute in perpetuity £100 a year—has come and said to the debtor, “How much owest thou?” “A hundred pounds.” “Write down £75.” And that without a halfpenny of compensation, remember, to the creditor, whose income for all time to come is reduced by 25 per cent. At any rate, that proposal may have, and I think ought to have, one result—it ought to clear not only our minds but our debates of the cant—for cant it has become—about the inviolate sacredness of property and contract.

Mr. Asquith.

I venture to warn hon. Gentlemen who sit on that side of the House, who are going to vote for the Bill at the Reading of this Bill, that they are estopped by the Vote that they gave last night from ever proposing to bring again on the ground of principle against any invasion on the part of the Legislature of proprietary rights. I do not know myself any clearer case of what the Romans used to call novae actiones in the whole history of confiscation. But what has that come about? One of my friends, I think the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, in the debate on the Second Reading of this Bill, pointed out that there had not been a single argument used in support of this measure—in my report, that is to say, of the diminution of the statutory payment chargeable to the tithe-payers in this case—that could not be used with equal force in favour of cutting down both the interest and principal of mortgages. What is the difference in point of principle between the claim of a mortgagee in the case of a private contract, and the claim of the Irish Church Fund in this case? There is no difference in point of principle, but there is a great difference in point of fact. What are the parties to this bargain? On the one side you have the Irish landlords, an articulate and organised party, a class which, as we know by recent experience, is capable of inflicting on the Government the luxury of an annual defeat in the House of Lords. That is a peculiar prerogative of theirs which is not possessed by any other class. On the other hand, we have a public fund which has no organ of expression, of self-defence, of resistance, except the right hon. Gentlemen who sit upon the bench, and who are by the law and constitution of this country its appointed custodians and trustees. An hon. friend reminds me that as lately as last year, for this Bill was introduced last year and then withdrawn, owing to what is called the exigencies of Parliamentary business, a very prominent representative of the Irish landlords (the Duke of Abercorn) said in another place, “Why should this Government, the strongest in our time, not only in ability, but in votes, not support their friends who support them?” That was asked last year when this Bill was withdrawn; it is not going to be withdrawn this year, and those who support the Government are at last to supported. I pass to what I consider to be the crowning absurdity and injustice of this Bill. That is the proposal that in the future the tithe rent-charge is to vary according to the amount of the judicial rent. I should have thought that such a proposition as that would hardly admit of argument at all. Let the House consider for a moment what it means. This matter is going to be arranged differently by county. You are not going to take an average of the reduced rents for Ireland as a whole; you are going to deal with it piecemeal, and the amount which the landlord's contribution as a repayer to the Irish Church Fund is to be used is to correspond with the amount which the judicial rents in his county have been reduced. The result is that wherever the reduction in the judicial rent has been greatest the reduction of the tithe rent-charge is greatest. Therefore it is exactly in those places where, in the judgment of the Land Courts, the landlords have exacted rents which did not justifiably or morally belong to them, but were based on tenants' improvements, that the greatest relief is given. There is one circumstance connected with the operation of this particular standard of judicial reduction—what I will call the standard of confiscation—which I think the House ought to bear in mind, because I believe it explains the whole of this Bill. The only ground upon which the Bill can be logically based is that it is an allotment of compensation to the landlords for the reduction of rents which have been made under Act of Parliament. I cannot myself see any other ground on which the fall in judicial rents should henceforth be treated as the basis on which tithe rent-charge should be reduced. I will refer hon. Gentlemen opposite, and particularly right hon. Gentlemen, to a speech of the Duke of Devonshire on another day. He pointed out that an actual economic fall in rents was assured by experience in this country is, as great as, and in many cases far greater than, the compulsory reductions which have been made by the land tribunals in Ireland. He might also have pointed out to his audience was particularly appropriate for the purpose—that so far as these excessive rents, which have been induced by the operation of the law, were based upon the appropriation by a landlord of the value put by a tenant, through his industry and capital, into the land, they were morally and politically indefensible. And, further, I will venture to say that the reduced rents now paid by the tenants and received by the landlord ought to be regarded as salvage from the social and economic wreck to which the landlords themselves have largely contributed. The rents which were charged prior to 1881, which appear in the contracts of tenants and which the landlords had a legal right to exact, were rents far in advance of what was the economic rent. What is more to the purpose is—and I again quote the authority of the Duke of Devonshire—they were rents which, in the then social condition of Ireland, not the whole force of the Empire of Great Britain could have made effectively recoverable from the tenants of Ireland, because the moral sense of the community of Great Britain would not have allowed you to use it. In so far, then, as this Bill is an attempt—I can find no other logical justification for it—to compensate the landlords of Ireland indirectly for the reductions which they have had to sustain in their rents, it ought to be repudiated by this House. I say it is a Bill which offends equally against the rules of common justice and sound finance. It tears up a statutory contract without adequate reason and without any compensation. It impairs, not only by what it does, but still more by the example it sets, the security of the Irish Church Fund. It introduces as the basis and standard of variation in tithe the fall in judicial rents, which is either wholly irrelevant or illogical. On these grounds the Bill is deserving of the condemnation of Parliament, and I beg to move that it be read a third time upon this day three months.

Amendment proposed,

“To leave out the word ‘now,’ and at the end of the Question to add the words ‘upon this day three months.’”—(Mr. Asquith.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the question.”

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I confess that when the right hon. Gentleman rose to take part in the debate for the first time I was somewhat at a loss to conceive the reasons which induced him, at the eleventh hour, to intervene in this particular controversy. I am now no longer in doubt, and I think I can explain it before I sit down. The right hon. Gentleman, in the closing third of his speech, devoted himself to an attack on the Irish landlords, whom he declared to be the spoilt darlings of the Government, and in whose favour we were prepared to ask the House to commit a gross injustice upon a public fund. I do not know that the occupants of this Bench or the Chief Secretary have any special reason to be grateful for the attentions which the Irish landlords have showered upon us. For my own part, I am the last person to criticise utterances which may well be put on one side. But I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it worth while to make an impassioned and elaborate attack upon a class who are not very popular either in this country or in the other, in numbers not very great, in political influence not very great, but who at the hands of Parliament in times past have been subjected to a kind of legislation on which I am not going to comment now, but which certainly has no parallel in the legislation of any civilised country. In his attack on the landlords the right hon. Gentleman has not scrupled to insinuate, even to assert, that the reduction of their rents by the Land Courts is the measure of the spoliation which they have inflicted upon their tenants, a scandalous and outrageous attack which was refuted by the right hon. Gentleman himself in the latter part of his speech, for he quoted, with enthusiastic approval by his supporters, a statement made by the Duke of Devonshire in another place that, after all, although the reductions of rent in Ireland had been considerable, they were not more considerable, but even less, than the reductions of rent which have taken place in England. Are the reductions of rent in England the measure of the spoliation inflicted by the English landlords on English tenants? No, Sir, they are the consequence of a fact, so notorious that I need not bring it to the attention of the House—the extreme, unforeseen, and unprecedented fall in agricultural value; and when the right hon. Gentleman roundly accuses the Irish landlords of having put all the difference between their present and former rents upon the improvements of the tenant, he might have remembered that the fall of agricultural prices, which has so afflicted the landed interest in England and Scotland, had not been absent in Ireland; and, mark this, the part of Ireland where rents have fallen, perhaps in greater degree than in any other part of Ireland, is that where the tenants' improvements were protected before the legislation of 1872 and 1880. It is in Ulster, where the tenants' improvements are protected by the Ulster custom, and adequately protected by the Ulster custom, that the fall in rents has been greater than in any other part of Ireland. Then, says the right hon. Gentleman, this is an act of spoliation great, so flagrant and shameless, that no Gentleman who votes for the Third Reading of the Bill can ever again resist an act of spoliation passed upon a class of public funds. He compared it with the arbitrary diminution by Parliament of the interest upon mortgages. What resemblance is there between mortgage and tithe rent-charge? Mortgage never was a variable quantity. Historically, by general tradition, and universally accepted within a small compass of years, tithe has been a variable quantity, and why this House, dealing with a fund varying in its aspects, should not make its variations dependent on a rational plan, instead of an arbitrary system, passes my belief. What is the right hon. Gentleman's desire? I suppose he thinks it would be fair to have variations determined by the price of wheat and barley and oats. Could anything be more absurd than fixing the variations of tithe in proportion to a crop which is hardly grown in Ireland at all? Over large districts it is wheat, and wheat alone, which determines the variations of the tithe rent-charge. That is the right hon. Gentleman's idea of equity, justice, and fairness. That is not all I have got to say against the right hon. Gentleman's accusation of spoliation. Has he ever heard of the alteration made in the annuities bought by the purchasers of glebe in Ireland? Those annuities were part of the assets of the Church Fund. They were bought directly under Parliamentary statutory contract by the glebe purchasers from the Church Fund. In 1885, Parliament, taking into account the great fall in the price of produce, consequently in the price of land, had mercy upon these glebe purchasers and diminished the amount of the interest on the annuities—in other words, reduced the assets of the Church Fund in favour of the glebe purchasers. Was that described as a dole? Was that described as a corrupt bargain? Was that described as a payment to a class? It was done by the common assent

Mr. A. J. Balfour.

This House, with the assent of the hon. Gentlemen opposite and of the hon. Gentlemen from Ireland, not then so solicitous about the Church Fund as they appear to now. And all this fine rhetoric which was lavished when you are dealing with landlords was not heard of when you were dealing with tenants, and all these strong epithets were reserved for a more favourable and more popular opportunity. The truth is that the motive of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was sufficiently apparent when he gave his brief historic survey of what he called the annual dole which this Government gives to their supporters. [Opposition cheers.] I thought so. It is no particular love for the Church Fund, it is no burning anxiety to support hon. Gentlemen below the gangway, that has produced this unlooked for intervention of the right hon. Gentleman. He has taken occasion to make a speech, which, perhaps, he supposes may be an electioneering speech. He has travelled far outside the four corners of this Bill to excite prejudice on questions not even in the remotest manner connected with this Bill. I am not going to argue, I would be out of order to argue, about the amount of money given to rates in connection with the Local Government Bill for Ireland, or the half rates to farmers in England and Scotland, or the grant to Voluntary schools. But one word I think I may say on these three topics. I remember perfectly well when the first sketch of the Irish Local Government Bill was made in this House—because it so happened I was the person on whom the duty devolved to make it—an essential part of that scheme was to get rid of the natural, I venture to say just, or at all events the justifiable, objections which were naturally felt at so great a transfer of power from one class to another in Ireland, where, unhappily, divisions between parties had been so long and so bitter. How was that proposal met? Did we hear anything from the right hon. Gentleman and his friends about doles on that occasion? Not a word. I remember that that proposal, which was an integral part of that Bill, was met with a chorus of approval not alone from Members on this side of the House, but from gentlemen representing Ireland on that side of the House, and from their colleagues representing English constituencies.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: It was the bribe we had to pay for Irish local government.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman; but let me take him on his own terms. Is it fair to swallow a bribe and then express disapproval when you get what you want by it? So much for the dole connected with local government in Ireland. Now I come to the half rates, which the right hon. Gentleman says we gave to the landlords in England. We gave them to the farmers. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] Well, I am going to put a simple query to Members for agricultural constituencies in England sitting opposite. When they go down to their constituencies, and when they issue their addresses, is this dole to the farmers of England going to be represented as a monstrous abuse, and is there going to be any proposal that it should be repealed by the next Parliament? I shall be curious to have an answer to that question. I come now to the third dole, and that is the extra grant to the Voluntary schools. In that dole every single gentleman from Ireland supported the Government, and every single gentleman from Ireland voted against the Opposition. They were all for a policy of doles and subventions. Again I ask, are you going to the country to ask the country whether they are going to take away from the Voluntary schools the dole that has been given to them? And are you going to have the support of the Irish Members when the time for this inevitable policy arrives? It is all nonsense. The whole of this flimsy attack can be torn to pieces in a moment, and I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman, plunging into a controversy with which I venture to say he is very little acquainted—[HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!]—judging from his speech, I think he is not intimately acquainted with the details, and that will come out before this debate concludes—I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have dragged these matters into a debate which is important because it is controversial, but which has really nothing to do with the issue he has tried to raise, with the irritation he has tried to stir up, or the passions he has endeavoured to inflame, and which might have been left now, as on the earlier stages of this Bill, to be debated between the representatives of the Irish Government in this House and the representatives of Ireland.

MR. DILLON: I think the tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman proves, if proof were needed, more than anything we have listened to in the course of this debate, the badness of the case of the Government. When the right hon. Gentleman denounced the right hon. Member for East Fife for intervening in this debate, he seems to have an extraordinary idea of the position of Irish Members in this House. As I have pointed out on previous occasions, we would always be glad if all English Members refrained from debate or division on Irish Bills or questions; but I protest against the doctrine that if the intervention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland who is not an Irish Member is to be accepted, we are to be denied assistance of hon. Members on this side of the House who are not Irish Members, but who choose to take up the cause of Ireland. I must say I am exceedingly grateful to the right hon. Member for East Fife for his speech, which tore to pieces, I do not say the arguments for, but the provisions of the Bill, and exhibited in a most powerful way its true inwardness. The right hon. Gentleman has fallen back on an argument given before by the Chief Secretary in the course of the debate. He reminded the House of the case of the glebe purchasers, and endeavoured to draw a most absurd parallel between the reduction of the interest granted to them and the reduction of the interest proposed to be given to the tithe rent charge payers. The glebe purchasers, it is true, were forced to buy their holdings at a time when land was greatly inflated in value, and the reason why very moderate concessions were made to them was that they were poor men struggling to make a living upon the land. What bearing has this in the case of men whose tithe rent-charge is only a very small charge on the land? If we were to accept the logic of that argument we should be carried irresistibly to the conclusion that because in Ireland there had been reduction of rents to occupiers effected by a process of law, therefore you are bound to reduce every charge on the land—quit rents, Crown rents, and mortgages. I say that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman absolutely disappears on that ground. The Members in charge of this Bill have been extremely free and ready to hurl charges against the gross ignorance of those who oppose it. If any English or Scotch Member intervenes he is said to be grossly ignorant; but the right hon. Member for East Fife exhibited, in my opinion, great intelligence in discussing the Bill, and certainly in point of capacity and knowledge of the law he compares favourably with the Attorney General for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman got up, and from the box at the Table announced with vehemence that the rents had been reduced most in the province where the improvements of the tenants were protected by the Ulster custom. I should like to hear the opinions of the Ulster tenants on that point. Were the rents in Ulster and the improvements of the tenants protected by the custom before the Land Act was passed? Why, the custom gave no protection to tenants' improvements in Ulster, and that was the great reason why the Act of 1881 was passed. It was because the tenants in Ulster were pouring into the Land League, and the Government were frightened by the fact. If the improvements had been protected by custom, why did the Ulster tenants come into the Land League? I will tell the right hon. Gentleman one of the reasons, if he does not know it already, why the rents in Ulster had been reduced much more than in the South. It was because the tenants in Ulster, encouraged by the custom, and led to hope that they would have a saleable interest in the land, did make more improvements than the tenants in the South, and consequently their rents had been much more reduced. It is the fact, and the statement of the right hon. the Member for East Fife stands absolutely unanswerable, and cannot be controverted, that this Bill, in addition to all its other vices—God knows it has vices enough—actually proposes to put a premium on the bad landlords by graduating the amount of remission of tithe rent-charge in proportion to their badness. I know estates where there never has been a judicial rent fixed at all; and why? Because the landlords have been humane men, and met the circumstances of the time by reasonable remissions of rent. Now, supposing you could imagine—it is perfectly conceivable and legitimate to make the supposition—that there was

county in Ireland in which all the landlords were good, reasonable men, and where no judicial rents had been fixed at all, what would this Bill do? It would give a reduction of 35 per cent. in the tithe rent-charge in a neighbouring county where all the landlords were rack-renters, and not a penny of reduction in the county where the landlords were good, reasonable men. Could anyone imagine a wilder extremity of absurdity? But there is another absurdity underlying the vicious economic principle involved in the standard of variation introduced into this Bill. The tithes were originally one-tenth of the gross produce of the land. They never had, throughout all their history, so far as I have any knowledge of the question of tithes, any relation to the cost of production, or subsequently to the rent. By the Act of 1838, in consideration of the substitution of a rent-charge leviable from the landlord in place of a tenth of the produce, and of its becoming a prior lien on the land, the tithe-owners consented to an enormous reduction in the value of their tithe, amounting in some cases to 60 or 70 per cent. All this is to be taken into consideration in estimating the nature of the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge. From 1838 to 1872 it was variable, but since 1872 it was invariable and a first charge on the land, having priority over all other charges, except quit-rents. You are now introducing a totally new principle of variation according to rents. I maintain that the variation of rent ought not, and as a matter of fact does not, bear an exact proportion to the variation of the prices of agricultural produce. Suppose the prices of agricultural produce had remained stationary, and the cost of the production had increased, rents would have been bound to go down. On the Second Reading of this Bill I said that it was a proposal as regards the main part of its provisions to subsidise the Irish landlord, and I ventured to suggest that it would be much simpler, more honest, and sounder, from an Irish point of view, if the Government would make up their minds how much money they were going to distribute amongst the Irish landlords, and put it in the Bill, be it £1,500,000 or £2,000,000. That course, however, did not recommend itself to the Government. I venture to point out to the Chief Secretary that this system of bribery will produce no good result. You are now proposing to plunder the Church Fund, which was put aside by Parliament for the Irish public, for the sake of bribing the Irish landlords, and you are now reaping your reward. I was not surprised at a certain bitterness of tone in the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury. At a great Orange meeting held on the 12th July, Lord Erne, Grand Master of the Orange Society, denounced the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary as a pest and a nuisance, and declared that the brothers Balfour were the curse of Ireland. That is all the reward they get. These Orange gentlemen understand their proceedings perfectly well. They believe they have got this Bill by abuse, and the only result of the Government throwing their body to the wolves will be that the wolves will howl louder at their back than ever. One lamentable consideration which the House of Commons and the Government have got to hug to their bosoms is that, instead of getting any benefit whatever from any section by this pernicious Bill, it will be found that the Irish people are indignant, as they ought to be, and regard it as an act of spoliation; while the Irish landlords will denounce the brothers Balfour as the greatest pests which ever came to Ireland. After all the discussions on this Bill, I am only confirmed in the opinion that a more indefensible one was never introduced into this House. I desire to say a few words on a portion of the Bill which has been somewhat neglected in the course of the discussions—the portion which deals with those tithes which are private property. The discussions in Committee have, I think, fully justified the protest which I ventured to make on the Second Reading against the plan adopted by the Government of including in the Bill two subjects incompatible and unsuited to be dealt with in the same measure—one the payment made by the ecclesiastical tithe-payers to a public fund, and the other the payment made by the tithe lay impropiator; that is a payment made by one set of individuals to another, who are owners of what is really private property, just as much as Government stock is, and which, as a matter of fact, has been made a subject of sale in Ireland continually for over sixty years. Hardly a week passes that you do not see in Dublin newspapers advertisements of the sale of lay impropriate tithes as a portion of real estate. Now, these tithes have been variable according to certain standards, and by well ascertained methods; and for sixty-two years they have never been interfered with, nor has a suggestion ever been made to alter the standard of variation. About seven or eight years ago the Government made a blunder by discontinuing the publication in the Dublin Gazette of the tables of the average prices of wheat and oats as the necessary evidence of variation; and the result was that the lay inappropriate tithes could not be varied for a period of seven years. But the Government might have recommended the republication of the average prices, and then, after seven years, these lay inappropriate tithes might have been varied as they had been for sixty-two years. All that was necessary was to fill in this gap of seven years by a short Bill of one clause, according to the prices in the Reports of the Irish Land Commission. I cannot conceive why the Government did not concede that, except that they wanted a bit of oil or grease for other purposes. The Government, taking advantage of this excuse of a mistake in the publication of the Government Gazette, propose to alter the standard of variation which governs the relation of exclusive property between man and man. From whom has come a call for such a course of conduct? Has it come from the tithe-payers or the tithe-owners? The result of this arbitrary alteration of the standard of variation will be that some tithe-owners will be able to get a good deal more than they would under the old variations, and some will get a good deal less. I have never got an answer to the question, on what ground the Government have obtained the right to walk in between the owners of this private property and say, "Take this Bill for £50 and write it down £40"; or, "Take this Bill for £50 and write it up £60." What is the excuse or justification for that? I have here a very curious document in connection with this question. There is an association in Ireland of lay inappropriate tithe-payers. I do not know whether the lay inappropriate tithe-owners have an association. The lay inappropriate tithe-payers claim that the average prices of agricultural produce should be published, and their legal right restored of having their payments regulated by these average prices. They held a meeting last spring to consider the proposals of the Government Bill of last year, which was exactly the same as the present Bill. In a speech at that meeting, made by Mr. Sandhurst, he said that they ought to appeal to the Government to introduce a Bill to remedy the great injustice complained of that they were not able to get their legal right of variation. And Mr. Sandhurst added that they did not consider the Bill of last session met the case as all of the lay inappropriate tithe-payers, nor could such a measure be accepted. The lay inappropriate tithe-payers are not satisfied with this Bill, because it gives too much relief to some and not enough relief to others; in other words, because it arbitrarily alters the law without regard to justice. I assert positively that during my twenty years experience of the House of Commons no such proposal was ever made to interfere with the rights of property on any public or private ground. There was no necessity of any kind for it, except that the right hon. Gentleman said, when pressed, that it would make the law more symmetrical. That is a most favourable illustration of the spirit in which this Bill was drafted; and I think the Government have treated the House of Commons very unfairly in having mixed up the greater question of ecclesiastical tithes with this of purely private property, which might be dealt with by a Bill of one clause. Now, I turn for a moment to the proviso in Clause 1 by which the Church Fund is to lose £1,300,000. But before I say anything on the financial position of the Church Fund after this Bill passes into law, I desire to deal with the contention put forward two or three times, that the fifty-two years annuities were based upon a miscalculation. The right hon. Gentleman seemed, on the Second Reading, to venture to doubt whether we would question his contention that this fifty-two years was a miscalculation. In that he was most audacious. Remember that if we destroy the theory of this miscalculation, we destroy the only justification for the first sub-section of this clause, which involves a loss to the Church Fund of £1,300,000.

Mr. G. W. BALFOUR: £1,110,000.

Mr. DILLON: How is the theory of miscalculation made out? In 1869, when Mr. Gladstone introduced the Church Bill

first, he proposed that it should be open to the payers of tithe rent-charge to buy their tithe rent-charge, either for cash, at twenty-two and a half years purchase, or to buy the gross tithe rent at twenty-two and a half years purchase, the Government lending them money on such terms that, by making an annual payment for forty-five years, principal and interest would be extinguished; and he stated that he calculated the annual payment would be $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the gross tithe rent-charge. The original proposal was for forty-five years instalments; but when the Bill came into Committee Mr. Gladstone himself moved an amendment to Clause 32, proposing to substitute fifty-two years instalments for forty-five years, and at the same time he agreed that the tithe rent-charge payers should have the right to deduct from their tithe rent-charge, before the price was calculated, the sum of the whole of the poor-rate, which was considerable. Again, he made a further concession. Whereas at the Second Reading of the Bill he proposed that the instalments should be at the rate of £4 10s. per cent. of the gross tithe rent-charge, in Committee he proposed that it should be £4 9s. per cent. per annum of the nett valuation, and that the instalments should be spread over fifty-two years. Now, that settlement was denounced by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer as sacrilegious bribery, and also by the chief Irish landlords. On a division, however, it was carried by the unanimous vote of the landlords in this House, despite the protest of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Forster and the Radical party. Now the right hon. Gentleman has the audacity to get up and tell us that the whole of this transaction was based on an arithmetical miscalculation, a calculation which was first of all worked out by the English Treasury, adopted by Mr. Gladstone, and passed the test of prolonged discussion in this House. I admit that some exception was taken to it; but it was as being too favourable to the landlords. Neither Mr. Disraeli nor Mr. Gladstone nor the champions of the Irish landlords ever suggested the doctrine of miscalculation which is now advanced. Then a period of three years elapsed, and the whole question was re-surveyed in this House in 1872, and again the Irish landlords, who were largely represented in this House and in the House of Lords, never protested, and the Bill passed through the two Houses of Parliament without a single word of criticism on their part. Therefore up to the Act of 1872 there was no suggestion whatever of a miscalculation. From 1872 down to 1881 and from 1881 to 1890 the whole intelligence of the Irish landlords as well as of the innumerable skilful lawyers who are attached to them in Ireland was devoted to searching and rummaging through the land legislation passed by this House in order to find a grievance. Yet this miscalculation was never heard of. Are we to be told that the Irish landlords and the lawyers who are their friends in Ireland would not have discovered during these years this arithmetical mistake, and the greatest that would ever have appeared in history if it existed? In June, 1894, Lord Belmore in his famous question started this doctrine. What set the Irish landlords on this theory of miscalculation? They were set on it because it had come to their knowledge that a great loan on the Irish Church Fund was to be paid off, and that when it was paid off a certain sum would be set free, and it occurred to the Irish landlords that they ought to get hold of it. It was really for that reason, and for no other reason that I can discover, that they invented this doctrine of miscalculation. Lord Belmore put a series of questions in the House of Lords, in the course of which this doctrine was started. He asked why did the Treasury in 1869 recommend the Government of the day to alter the terminable annuities from forty-five years to fifty-two, and also whether there was not a miscalculation made as to the term of years in which the principal sums with interest would be paid off? That involved the doctrine that Mr. Gladstone and the Treasury of that day were not able to calculate in what number of years an annuity would pay off a principal sum with interest. Lord Belmore was informed in reply that there was no miscalculation because no rate of interest was prescribed in the Act. After the lapse of twenty-eight years the Treasury on the motion of Lord Belmore again examined the question, and laid it down that there was no basis for the charge of miscalculation, and yet in face of that fact and the other facts I have cited the right hon. Gentleman states that the case of the landlords is perfectly clear. This is what the right hon. Gentleman said on the point—

"Objection to this provision of the Bill must therefore be made on either of two grounds: First, that a $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. rate of interest is too low—which would be a bold assertion in the face of Mr. Gladstone's own statement, and of the fact that the rates of interest formerly paid by tenant purchasers of Church lands have all been reduced from $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Or, secondly, that it is just that a terminable annuity for the redemption of a capital sum should continue to be paid for seven years after such capital sum can be shown by the rules of arithmetic to have been repaid."

That is saying in so many words that Mr. Gladstone did not understand, and that for twenty-nine years the British Treasury were absolutely unable to grasp, the rules of arithmetic. That is a most extraordinary position for the right hon. Gentleman to take up, and yet it is the only ground on which he can justify this enormous drain on the Church Fund. I maintain after all these prolonged discussions that there is no shadow or shred of excuse for surrendering to the Irish landlords seven years instalments which they contracted to pay, and which in justice they ought to be compelled to pay as long as they retain their land. Let me turn for a few minutes to the effect of this Bill on the Church Fund, because that, after all, is a very important question, and one which we were not able to discuss fully in Committee. I thought we might have been able to obtain some more light on the matter. I have been endeavouring ever since the Bill of last year was introduced to obtain from the Government a really satisfactory calculation of what will be the effect of this Bill if passed into law on the Church Fund, and I have never been able to get anything but the most perfunctory and confusing answers. I think the Bill has been drawn in such a way that it is absolutely impossible to calculate with any degree of certainty what will be its effect on the Church Fund, and that alone would be a sufficient ground for rejecting it, because I cannot conceive any more vicious method of legislation than, as regards a complicated Bill affecting a great public fund, to be told by the minister in charge that it is really impossible to ascertain the effect of the Bill. This is the only statement vouchsafed to us during the discussions on this Bill by the right hon. Gentleman as to its effect on the fund. He said—

"I may say, generally, that the result of the calculations has been most carefully verified both by the Treasury and by the Land Commission; and I think we may take it that as far as possible, accuracy has been obtained. At least, it is not for want of trouble taken by one side or the other. Now, the reduction of the period of the currency of the terminable annuities will have the effect of reducing the Church Fund by a capital sum of £1,140,000; but this loss will not begin until the year 1917, when the earliest terminable annuities run out. What effect are the proposals of the Bill likely to have on the resources of the Church Fund? By the first proposal, that fund will ultimately lose a capital sum of about £1,140,000, but this loss will not begin until the year 1917. The second proposal of the Bill will result in the immediate loss of an annual sum of about £33,000. This loss will continue for the first fifteen years, and may increase in subsequent periods of fifteen years with any additional average reduction of judicial rents. The abolition of the right to redeem the tithe rent-charge will result in a gain to the Church Fund of a capital sum, the exact amount of which it is impossible to state, but which may conceivably be £3,500,000. This gain, however, will not begin to accrue for forty-five years from the present time. [Mr. DILLON: Is that based on the supposition that no sales take place?] Yes, that is so. By the fourth proposal of the Bill there will be a gain to the Church Fund of an annual sum of £6,000."

We are told that if no land is sold in Ireland the Church Fund in forty-five years will gain three and a half millions, but land is now being sold in Ireland at the rate of about one and a half millions per annum, and there is a movement, which if I do not misunderstand it will result in transferring all the land of Ireland to the farmers certainly within the next twenty years, and probably within the next ten years. Therefore this calculation, on the strength of which we are to make this huge inroad into the Church Fund, is absolutely delusive. We are solemnly asked to look forward and to attach weight to a possible advantage to the Church Fund resulting from the abolition of the right to redeem, which will begin to accrue in forty-five years, and only begin if no sale of land takes place in the interval, whereas we all know that long before that period all the land of Ireland will be sold, and instead of three and a half millions I say that if the fund benefits to the extent of £200,000 it will be the outside figure possible. But the loss to the fund begins on the day on which this Bill becomes operative, and will continue and increase until the whole Church Fund will be dissipated. The provision in the Act of 1896 could at least be plausibly defended, as it was inserted for the purpose of promoting the sale of land to the tenants. It might have been said, just as it was said when we allowed the dole to the landlords in order to secure local government, that the landlords should be allowed to reap that advantage under the Act of 1896 as a reward for selling their land to their tenants, because everyone is anxious to get rid of this land quarrel, which has brought almost inconceivable evils on Ireland, and we are all prepared to make sacrifices to end it, on reasonable terms. Therefore when the clause in the Act of 1896 was introduced—although I am looked upon as irreconcilable in these matters, and I admit I am—I did not feel called upon to protest against it, just as I abstained from dividing against the Agricultural Grant in 1898, because although I did not approve of the principle, there was a great object to be gained, which I was willing should be gained, even at the cost of the Church Fund. But what do you propose to do by this Bill? You reverse that policy. You are now offering to the landlords who have refused to sell the same advantages and concessions as were given by the Act of 1896 to landlords who were willing to sell, and in that way also you are doing a great wrong. I think the First Lord of the Treasury was very ill-advised in throwing sneers across the House at the Irish Members who are working under very difficult circumstances to protect the interests of their constituents. He said it was very unfair of us to adopt the attitude we did adopt with regard to the Rating Act, and he said that we swallowed the bribe. We are obliged to endeavour to pass legislation for our own country in this House in circumstances of the most cruel difficulty, and we are obliged to submit to the conditions imposed on us by the strangers who rule us. We have never been able to discuss Irish matters on their merits in this House. You never deal with Irish measures on their merits. You deal with them either because of the disturbed condition of Ireland or because you wish a bribe to be distributed among a certain class in that country. When a measure of land reform or popular government is offered to us it is always tied up with some condition we strongly object to, but we are told that we must swallow the whole thing or get nothing. That is the principle we are compelled to accept, and I am not a bit ashamed of our accepting it under the circumstances. But I warn the First Lord of the Treasury and the Irish Secretary that the course they are pursuing on this Bill will gain them neither authority nor respect in Ireland. The Chief Secretary has been five years in office, and has made flourishing speeches about killing Home Rule by kindness.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It has been said over and over again that I used the words "killing Home Rule by kindness." I should be very glad to have the report of that speech produced.

MR. DILLON: The phrase has been quoted by the right hon. Gentleman's supporters.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have had no opportunity of challenging the statement in the House before.

MR. DILLON: My recollection is that the right hon. Gentleman had been charged with the intention of killing Home Rule by kindness, and that he said he would be very glad if he succeeded in doing so. What I would advise him to pursue would be a policy not of kindness but of justice. I resented that speech as it was reported at the time, because I do resent, as I think I am entitled to resent, Englishmen or Scotchmen coming over to Ireland and adopting a tone of superiority and condescension which the Irish people do not appreciate. If the right hon. Gentleman pursues such a policy as that he will never win respect from any section of the population. What we want in Ireland is fair play and justice, and if the right hon. Gentleman would embark on a policy of fair play—I do not say he would kill Home Rule, because he would not—he would win the respect of all sections of the Irish people. But the policy of bribery, the policy which has dictated this Bill, will have the effect of exasperating the Irish people who agree with us, and of arousing only the contempt of the section represented by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman, while the Government are engaged in passing this Bill, does not use the same language as he would use at an Orange meeting in Ireland. The Chief Secretary has now learned after five years administration in Ireland, although he has distributed hundreds of thousands of pounds as largess among the Irish landlords, that all he has got is to be denounced as a second "Dick Turpin," and to be told that he and his brother are the greatest curses ever sent to Ireland.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I only desire to occupy the time of the House for a few minutes in referring to matters not hitherto mentioned in the debate. First, as to the manner in which this Bill has been introduced—there are only two names on the back of it, namely, the Attorney General for Ireland and the Chief Secretary. I maintain that that is a public scandal in a public Bill. This Bill is eminently a financial measure. It deals with an enormous amount of money to be transferred from a public fund to a particular class in Ireland, and it is a gross public scandal that the Finance Minister should not be publicly responsible for it. The Finance Minister is Chancellor of the Exchequer not only for England but for Ireland, and it was his duty to have explained this Bill to the House. Then the other Finance Minister, the Secretary to the Treasury, has not in the least intervened in the debates. The names of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary to the Treasury have been on the back of all the other great financial measures referring to Ireland, because they dealt with public money. The name of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is absent from this Bill because he denounced its principle thirty years ago in language which has never been retracted. Probably the Secretary to the Treasury has also expressed his well-known opinions privately with reference to boodle of this kind. I say no Bill involving one and a half millions of money has ever been presented to this House except on the responsibility of the Finance Minister. Let me remind the House that the Irish patriot party insisted, when the Union was carried, on having an Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer to conduct Irish financial business in this House, and in the early years of this century the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer was no less a person than Mr. Foster, who had been Speaker of the Irish House of Commons. If you had a majority, not of 140, but of 300 in this House, and an Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer to guard the Irish purse, a measure of this kind would be impossible. The Conservative Members have shown me great courtesy, and it is irritating to them when a discussion on the matter which they think threshed out is continued, but I would point out that Mr. Disraeli, on the Second Reading of the Irish Church Bill, denounced this arrangement which is now being carried in the interests of the Irish landlords. Sooner or later, Mr. Disraeli said, the Irish landlords would gourmandise all the Church Fund. He said that the whole property of the Church of Ireland, generally speaking, would go to the landlords. (Interruption.) Hon. Gentlemen might well buzz at the idea of it. Mr. Disraeli went on to say that for thirty years the Irish landlords had had £100,000 a year out of the Church property, amounting in all to probably £3,000,000, and he asked what good it had done. Was the state of Ireland improved by it? But Mr. Disraeli under-estimated the case. When the first avaricious raid was made on the property of the Church of which the landlords were members, the Ecclesiastical tithe charge was commuted at a tenth of its value, and 25 per cent. over and above was paid to them for collecting it. In 1867 the agricultural crops in Ireland were of the value of £30,000,000, but the amount of the tithe rent-charge was only put at £370,000; whereas it ought to have been £3,000,000, and the difference between £370,000 and £3,000,000 went into the pockets of that virtuous class, the Irish landlords. I say that the landlords have got far too much out of the Irish Church Fund already; but by this Bill they are getting by the reduction of the annual instalments from fifty-two to forty-five years, a sum equal to £1,500,000, although the Chief Secretary, who is generally wrong in his calculations, only made it out at £1,140,000. I object to the Irish landlords getting through a brutal and palpable fraud anything out of the Church Fund, which ought to be devoted to the Irish people when suffering from some unavoidable calamity. The Irish landlords never object to charity. Long after the Reformation, successive Acts of Parliament were passed to enable tenants to make a raid on the Church lands. The Duke of Abercorn and others him are tenants of the lands stolen from the Irish Church. The Irish shops, who were generally English imitations—

MR. SPEAKER: I fear the hon. Member is going to somewhat ancient history in reference to this Bill.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: The object of the Bill is ancient history, but I will not refer to the matter, Mr. Speaker, if you tell me not to do so. I will do whatever you tell me.

MR. SPEAKER: As the hon. Member appeals to me, I would ask him not to continue his remarks on ancient Irish history.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: With great respect, I think that is rather an unfair advantage to take. You will do better if you will allow me to show that I was endeavouring to bring this ancient history into connection with this Bill. I am pleading that this Bill should not pass, and that the chief beneficiaries under this Bill have already got enormous slices of the Church land. The Duke of Abercorn—

MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member is really trifling with the House in going into this matter.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: If you do not permit me, I shall say no more; but if I am not permitted to speak of it in this House I shall be able to see that it is made well known in Ireland. The First Lord of the Treasury was scarcely right in saying that he was benefitting the Irish landlords in spite of themselves. He said, "We are only doing justice to the Irish landlords who are reviling us." He ought to have known that amongst the persons to whom he is doing this act of justice, and who will be most benefitted by it, are Members of the present Government and extensive Irish landlords. The benefit of this Bill to the ordinary poor Irish landlords, with a rental of £800 to £1,500 a year, is of small significance. But it is of enormous significance to these extensive Irish landlords. I will give the names of the members of the Government who will enormously benefit by the Bill—the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Londonderry, and the Earl of Pembroke. I will say, in conclusion, that I never recollect any Act which has been passed by a Ministry which will confer such pecuniary benefits on the members themselves, or certain of them, as this Act will. In fact, the whole thing is, I am sorry to say, a most atrocious and infamous fraud on a public fund—a fraud perpetrated on the poor in the interests of the rich. It is a perfect illustration of the proverb which warns not to rob the poor because they are poor. We have heard a great deal of the tithepayer, and of the equity which should attach to our dealings with him. But we have heard nothing of the titheowner, who is the person principally affected, because as the tithe rent-charge is reduced so surely is the tithe-owner affected. Why is that? It is because the titheowners are poor, and have no great political influence. On the whole I regard this Bill as, in the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, sacrilegious bribery. I am inclined, however, to rejoice at this Bill, because it destroys altogether the sanctity of contracts, and will make any attack on the public revenue or on private property utterly unassailable by gentlemen on these benches who have sanctioned this Bill.

MR. FLYNN: I complain of the attitude of the Treasury in regard to this Bill. One would have thought that the natural guardians of the Irish Church Fund, which is the only public fund which the Irish people have had since the Union, would have been the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General. But the hopes we have placed on them have been falsified. It is impossible but that there shall be loss on one fund or another; if not on the Church Fund it will fall on the Treasury, because nearly half of the liabilities of the Irish Church Fund have been guaranteed by the Treasury. On what ground did the Government bring in this Bill? They cannot put the saddle on two horses at once. Either the settlement of 1872 was wrong, and Mr. Gladstone and the Treasury of that date made an absolute mistake; and, as the Chief Secretary says, this Bill was introduced to correct that mistake; or the Duke of Devonshire was right when he said in another place that the Bill had been introduced as a compensation to the Irish landlords for the reduction of their rents by the Land Act of 1881. It is not the least invidious feature of this Bill that members of the Government, including the noble Lord whose speech has been already referred to, and members of the Cabinet, will be among those who will get a large slice out of the Irish Church Fund. I presume, if there is any virtue in actuarial calculations, that if the Treasury were right in 1895 they ought to be right now, and if in 1895 the Irish Church Fund would not bear any further burden, how is it possible that the Fund can now be so solvent and so strong that it can have this one and a half million taken away from it as well as £33,000 a year, especially when it is considered that since 1895 £70,000 a year has also been taken from it for the Agricultural Board? The Treasury have been got at. In 1895 they opposed the proposal of the Land Commissioners to reduce the repayments of the debt to them on behalf of the Irish tenants from twenty-two and a half to twenty years. That was refused in connection with a large scheme of land purchase, to which both political parties were committed, and the Government opposed it on the ground that it would affect the Irish Church Fund. Meantime £70,000 a year has been taken from it for the Agricultural Board. We are told that that £70,000 is all right, and that if at the end of fifteen years this Department for improving agriculture and instructing our people cannot obtain that money, we might perhaps have a case to go to the Treasury. I should like to see the position of the Irish Minister who at the end of fifteen years would have to approach the Treasury and say that the Agriculture Department could not continue any longer. In conclusion I think we are justified in putting before the House, and I trust also before the country, that this Bill has not been demanded by any body of public opinion or by any important movement. It is a Bill brought in to satisfy a small but hungry section of the supporters of evictions in Ireland. It is a Bill which will give more to the rich landlord than to the small struggling landlord. To him that possesses much will be given more, whereas the poor landlords will be given

very little, but whether this money is given to the rich and prosperous landlord in large measure, or to the small struggling landlord in small measure, comes from an Irish fund which does not belong to the Treasury, and which is an act of tyranny on the part of English and Scotch Members to interfere with

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I feel it my duty, even at this advanced hour, to join in the final protest of my hon. friend against this Bill. It is certainly not our fault that the House has been put to the inconvenience of remaining up to this hour. The right hon. Gentleman insists on pushing the Bill through to-night, and that is the reason why Members have been put to the inconvenience of this prolonged sitting. The Leader of the Opposition, in the speech he made during these debates, described the Bill as the most extraordinary Bill of the century. I think that description was amply justified, and I think also that the Bill has been produced and carried through under very extraordinary circumstances. This is the sixth night on which we have dealt with this question, and there are much more urgent demands on the attention of Parliament. Only this afternoon the Leader of the House was asked on what date he would bring forward the Indian Budget. He was asked that question in view of an accumulation of suffering on the people of India which is unparalleled in history, and the right hon. Gentleman had to reply that he could just give one afternoon in the course of next week for discussing the fate and fortunes of 250 millions of people stricken by famine and plague and almost every other evil that can befall a nation. Again, 200 Members of this House asked for two or three hours to pass a Bill dealing with an important branch of the salvation of this country from the vice of drink, and that request was refused. A most important question, affecting the welfare of millions of people, has been refused discussion, while to an unjust measure like this Bill the Government have given six nights of most precious time. The Leader of the House made an impassioned reply to the speech of the late Home Secretary, and he made one observation in the course of that reply to which I will allude. The right hon. Gentleman laid down this proposition, which is ifying to me and most astonishing as ing from him, that he would be better ed if the right hon. Gentleman Member for East Fifehire had allowed debate to proceed on the lines on sh it has hitherto been conducted, ely between the official representa-s of the Irish Government and the h Members. He indignantly objected the intervention of one of the ablest nbers of this House in an Irish debate.

at would have been permissible if it ne from one who believed that Ireland uld be governed by the Irish Mem-s; but this indignant surprise at a ish Member venturing to intervene ween the official representatives of the sh Government and the Irish Members ne very strangely from one of the high ests of Unionism in this House. It is ite true that the debates on this Bill ve been mainly left to the Chief Sec-ary and the Irish Members, not only as the making of the speeches, but also to the hearing of the speeches. We re conducted these debates with only the ief Secretary and the Attorney General Ireland on the Treasury Bench, and an asional visit from the Leader of the use, and the Irish Members not in h large number as I should like, but l in considerable number on these ches. The benches opposite were as a e deserted, or perhaps occupied by two three phantoms—I use the word in a ritual rather than a physical sense—o made more conspicuous the absence he general body of the Conservative ty. But when the division bells were ig these gentlemen who had not heard ingle word of the speech, and who, I iture to say, would not pass the most mary examination as to the provisions even the first clause of the Bill, oped in from the terrace, the oke rooms, and the library, l voted down the representatives Ireland, not in accordance with the uments, because they did not hear m, but at the direction of the Whips their party. Therefore, when the st Lord of the Treasury objected to the ervention of the right hon. Member East Fife, who made a most able l brilliant speech, I think he would have en more logical ground if he had ed not only that the debates should be fined to the representatives of the h Government and the Irish Mem-s, but that the voting should be confined to them also. I should like to call attention to the statement of the Leader of the House that a great reduction of rents had taken place in Ulster. That was an avowal I was very glad to hear. I do not know whether his knowledge of that fact was the result of these debates, but I think he happened to be in the House when we were dealing with that particular branch of the question. He followed that, however, with the astounding statement that in Ulster the tenants' improvements had always been protected by the Ulster custom. Did that statement come as a matter of surprise to the Chief Secretary? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept it?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Broadly speaking, yes.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then I can only say that "broadly speaking" the ignorance of the right hon. Gentleman is almost as great as the ignorance of his brother. When the First Lord of the Treasury says that the tenants in Ulster were protected as to their improvements,
I assume he means by the Ulster custom.
But every Ulster man knows that the Ulster custom was confined to the right of free sale, and that right of free sale did not interfere with the right of the landlord to raise the rent on the incoming tenant in spite of the fact that the incoming tenant had paid for that right.
The Ulster men were in a state of more aggravated revolt than any other part of Ireland. The First Lord accepted the fact—he could not deny it on the statistics presented to the House—that the highest reductions took place in the northern province; but what did that prove? It proved the hypocrisy of the cry of the landlords that the reduction of the rents was the production of political agitation and not of their own rack-rents in the north of Ireland. In the county of Armagh the reductions in the rent amounted to 28 per cent., and in the county of Down, the most loyal of all the counties, the reductions of rent made by private agreement reached the extraordinary figure of 40 per cent.; and it was in these very counties where rack-renting had been most triumphant. Yet it is in these counties that the largest amount of the bribe provided by this Bill will be given to the Irish landlords. I do not see the right hon.
and gallant Member for North Armagh

in his place, but if he were here I would tell him that, instead of the landlords in these counties having a right of complaint against the Government, they have been the spoiled children and curled darlings of this Administration. The Irish landlords are the only class in this community who have been able to come to this House and get compensation for the reduction of their revenue brought about by economic and insurmountable causes. The Duke of Devonshire said some time ago that he had to submit to a 16 per cent. reduction of rent on his estates in Ireland, while, on a similar estate in Somerset, the reduction had been 35 per cent. But the difference between them is this: that for the reduction on his English estate he got no compensation whatever, always excepting the Agricultural Rating Act. And he dare not come to ask this House, because his rent had been reduced 35 per cent., to make it up to him. Even if he went to the House where he sits, which is the guardian on the social and political interests of the landlords, and said, "I want compensation because my rents in Somerset have been reduced 35 per cent.," he would be laughed to scorn. But when the loss is 16 per cent. in Ireland, that changes his character from an English to an Irish landlord; and he goes to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who says to him, "My poor gilded pauper, I really must come to your relief, because you have had 16 per cent. taken off your rents." And the right hon. Gentleman forthwith proceeds to bring in the Local Government Bill for Ireland, and because their Graces have been gracious enough to extend to Ireland the local liberties given by consent of all parties in England and Wales and Scotland, and which must therefore have come inevitably to Ireland by the logic of events, his Grace and the class to which he belongs are immediately relieved of practically all contribution to the local expenses of Ireland. But, not satisfied with that dole, they go to the right hon. Gentleman two or three sessions afterwards and demand that because their rents have been reduced 16 per cent.—half the reduction in England—they want more compensation. And the Chief Secretary, adding these poor gilded paupers, says, "I see, what fund is there which we can draw upon in order to put another dole into their pockets." And the right hon. Gentleman takes the unprotected Church Fund, makes a hole at it, and gives out of it practically millions of money to the landlords of Ireland, who had had their rents reduced 16 per cent., instead of 35 per cent. in England. The whole calculated and intended effect of this Bill and of such legislation is that the provisions and consequences of the Land Act of 1880 and the Act passed by the right hon. Gentleman himself, shall be nullified; full and adequate compensation shall be given for the reductions of rent in Ireland by successive hauls from the Irish Church Fund. These are reasons why we oppose this Bill. I know it will pass into law, but it has been fought very steadily in this House. I do not think it has been fairly fought, considering its importance. I believe that in another place it would be received rapturously, and welcome open arms. But this cannot go on ever. The Irish landlords have got their last dole, although their clamorous demands have not yet been exhausted. This Bill shows. I hope this will be the last session of the present House of Commons, and I trust that, if we all be Members of a future House of Commons, one of the first measures which will be introduced will be to put an end to this long and exhausting social struggle between the Irish landlords and the Irish tenants, and dispose of the claims of the Irish landlords by a scheme of purchase.

AND BOROUGH FRANCHISE ILIATION (LONDON) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

of the Day for the Second Read-

FARQUHAR: My Lords, so ed is the subject of the qualifica- elector that any measure which it will, I am sure, be welcomed Lordships. The object of this ch we may justly term a non-us Bill, is to assimilate the Council with the parochial and to obviate the anomaly of s of electors in London for local nt purposes; an anomaly that me more marked when the elections under the London Government Act, 1899, take place. The duties of the local and central authorities in London are so analogous that the distinction in the franchise was founded on no principle of logic, economy, or convenience. On the contrary, it has caused a great deal of confusion, and has made the registration both complicated and expensive. This Bill does not in any way interfere with the Parliamentary franchise, nor does it create a new franchise. It has to do purely with the domestic affairs of London, and is introduced to remedy a disparity in the electorate which has no analogy in the rest of the country. It will remove an anomaly in the London franchise by which those who hold the lodger and service franchise—about 100,000 in number—while having the right to vote in parochial elections, are denied the right to vote for the County Council. The Bill will also put the register for the London County Council and the register for the new London Borough Councils on the same basis, thereby contributing greatly to the simplification of the preparation of the voters' lists. In 1894 lodgers and service voters were allowed to vote for vestries and poor-law guardians, the former being the rate-paying authority, and the two together being responsible for two-thirds of the rate levied. We contend that a man who is entitled to vote for the rate-paying authority should also be entitled to vote for the spending body. This discrepancy in the franchise may be termed of fortuitous creation, and its assimilation would be but a logical evolution. The London County Council have unanimously approved of this change, and the Bill has passed through the House of Commons without any objection being raised to it.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Farquhar.)

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, I am very glad to be able to support most cordially the Second Reading of this Bill, and I do so because on this side of the House all extensions of the franchise are welcomed, even though, as in this case, they are not likely to operate favourably to our own cause. The effect of this Bill is to add three classes of electors to the county council electors in London. At this moment the London County Council electors consist of two classes—householders and women. To those classes will be added by this Bill lodgers, service voters, and freeholders. I am afraid we who hold Liberal opinions do not expect to get much advantage from the addition of those voters to the register; but we welcome the power being given them to vote, because we believe that the wider the basis of the franchise the better it will be for the country. We may, however, justly complain that when this measure was brought in the opportunity was not taken to remove some of the gross anomalies which exist with regard to the period required for the qualification to vote. The desire of the promoters of this Bill is to enable more people to vote, and one would have imagined that they would also have endeavoured to make it as easy as possible for men to get upon the register. They make no change in regard to the period of occupation, and a man who enters into occupation in August will still be unable to get upon the register for twenty-three months. That is a gross anomaly in the present law, and one which should be remedied. Even though it may be argued that it is not desirable to reduce the period of qualification for the Parliamentary franchise, surely for local purposes the qualification might be reduced to six months. If this were done a great boon would be conferred upon Londoners. I think a considerable burden of responsibility lies on the promoters of the Bill for not having proposed some reform in the way I have suggested.

*LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: My Lords, I have been asked to state what are the views of the Local Government Board with regard to this Bill, which is not without its importance as a matter of principle, the proposition before the House being to add some 100,000 voters to the register of the London County Council. The men it is now proposed to enfranchise have not hitherto been placed on the register of voters for the London County Council, in pursuance of the principle that those who elect the body who impose a rate should bear the burden of that rate. In 1894 the lodger and service suffrages were conferred in respect of the vestries. By the Act of last year the London municipalities became the successors of the vestries, and had conferred upon them the same powers of rate the vestries had. That being an anomaly arises that there are in London two rating bodies—the London County Council and the municipalities. The object of my noble friend's Bill is throughout the rating area the franchise shall be the same. The Government not oppose the Bill, but they wish to be quite understood that the measure must not be taken as a precedent endeavouring to depart from the principle I have mentioned in cases where an anomaly which prevails in London not exist. And if, therefore, it be sought to extend these non-rate branches to provincial county and municipal boroughs, the question involved must be regarded as being way affected by the fact that this has been allowed to become law.

On Question, agreed to. Bill accordingly, and committed to committee of the whole House on next.

ATTENDANCE OF PEERS COMMITTEES.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Information for which I most believe, kept in the House, and if printed and circulated, it would be a good deal of valuable information to Lordships. I therefore move Return standing in my name.

On Question, agreed to.

WAR OFFICE RECONSTRUCTION AND ARMY REORGANISATION.

*THE DUKE OF BEDFORD: My Lords, in asking the noble Marquess Secretary of State for War the question standing in my name, I need not detain Lordships by a long list of military deficiencies, or a long indictment of the War Office. I think I may safely claim a consensus of opinion as to the necessity of the reconstruction of the War Office. I use the word "reconstruction."

Lord Tweedmouth.

of building anew upon a cleared as opposed to patching up an antiquated structure. I apprehend that patch-work policy would not be acceptable to your Lordships. For instance, an inquiry into the War Office by officials or ex-officials, or still more useless, an inquiry by means of a Departmental Committee. Possibly the noble Marquess could indicate in outline the principles upon which the department over which he presides will due course be reconstructed. At the beginning of the South African campaign the Commander in Chief advised the country that war was a game of ups and downs. But of the latter we have experienced a greater share than can be fairly ascribed to bad luck alone. It is from the real reasons for our reverses, and not from the supposed causes of our successes, that the most valuable lessons of the war are to be learnt. It is impossible to conceive any scheme for Army reorganisation at the present moment which has not been preceded by an inquiry into the reasons for our failures in South Africa. But, my Lords, if such an inquiry is to command the confidence of the country, if it is to arouse that national interest in military matters indispensable for the future development of the Army, its results must be submitted to the judgment of Parliament. It is essential that Parliament should know the advice upon which the Secretary of State founds his plan of reconstruction. When we know the real reasons for our disasters, then we can take the first step towards the reorganisation of the Army. The second step is the formation of a correct idea of the military needs of the Empire. Previous to the present war, the defence of the Empire was considered amply secured by two Army corps for service abroad, and one for home defence. In round numbers that means 120,000 men. We have now an army of more than 220,000 men in South Africa, in addition to our home forces. With an error so colossal as the basis of all calculation in time of peace, there is small wonder that war should have revealed dangerous military deficiencies. This miscalculation seems to me in no way the fault of the War Office. The War Office was told, I presume, by the Cabinet that its maximum output was to be three army corps. On the outbreak of war it was not three army corps but the equivalent of six army corps for which provision was wanted. It is most important that the country should know who will be responsible in the future for calculating the military needs of the Empire. The reorganisation of the Army is one matter. To fill the ranks with men of the right stamp is another. Unless Her Majesty's Government can solve the problem of recruiting, manifestly the solution of all other military problems will be of no value, because the Army will have no men. The receipt for increasing the quantity of recruits has hitherto been to diminish their quality—that is, to lower the standard of physical development. The noble Marquess has told us that he does not think an increase of pay for the Army and the Militia would give results proportionate to the increased expenditure. I do not know why the noble Marquess considers that the Army should form the solitary exception to those influences which always have governed, and still govern, the labour market of the world, namely wages. I recognise that to increase the pay of the Army is to incur a great cost which is in itself a great evil. But in my opinion conscription is a greater evil, and the greatest evil of all is a wholly insufficient Army. It is scarcely possible to separate at the present moment the reconstruction of the War Office and the reorganisation of the Army from the still wider question of Imperial defence. Until a few months ago it was an article of faith in this country that the fate of the Empire would be decided by battles fought either upon the sea, or, if the worst came to the worst, at home. Recent events have shown that such decisive battles may be fought, and probably will be fought, neither upon the sea nor in the United Kingdom, but in Africa, in Asia, or in some other continent. Hence the pressing need of a comprehensive plan for Imperial defence. From among the many lessons of the war in South Africa, one stands out like stone, and it is this, that without the help of our colonies we should never have gone through with the war in the way which we have done. Presumably in any scheme of Imperial defence the colonies will be invited to join, as may seem good to themselves. Then, if we are to have an Imperial Army, is it to be a paper army only, or will it be assembled from time to time for the purposes of training and comradeship? Now, an Imperial Army can no more be trained for the field in England than a racehorse can be trained to gallop in a kitchen garden. Where, then, is the Imperial Army of the future to receive its field training? Is such a force to be trained where the Imperial Army now is, and where a strong garrison must always be maintained, in South Africa? South Africa is close to India and the East. It is not far from Egypt and the Mediterranean. It is a half-way house for Australia and New Zealand. It is not, as we gratefully acknowledge, beyond the reach of Canada. Then the climate is magnificent, and the area for field training and manœuvres unlimited. Finally, the concentration for the field training of an Imperial Army in South Africa would perfect our system of sea transport for cavalry, artillery, and infantry, and enable us to acquire that rapid mobility which the defence of our Empire absolutely demands. I have brought these questions to the notice of the noble Marquess, well knowing that it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to deal with them during this session; but before next session we hope to welcome home a victorious army. My Lords, I fear lest that triumphant return, by obliterating the memory of disasters, should become the means of establishing more firmly than ever that old order which ought now to change and give place to the new. I therefore beg to ask the noble Marquess whether Her Majesty's Government intend to inquire into the deficiencies of our military system, and to submit the results to Parliament with a view to the reconstruction of the War Office and the reorganisation of the Army.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, we are most anxious to withhold from your Lordships' House no information with regard to military matters which you may reasonably desire to possess, and I think I shall not be contradicted when I say that during the debates that have taken place this year we have invariably given the House frank and full information both with regard to matters of fact, and, as far as possible, with regard to our own intentions. But I think the questions which the noble Duke has addressed to me carry us to a point at which I may fairly ask, and at which I think the noble Duke himself will almost expect me to ask, for forbearance. Indeed, the noble Duke, in his concluding words, made it, I think, pretty clear that he did not expect that I should give him a full and detailed answer upon the many points he referred to. He asked me whether it was our intention to institute an inquiry into the deficiencies of our military system; whether that inquiry would be made with a view to the reconstruction of the War Office and the reorganisation of the Army; whether I could place him in possession of the principles upon which that reconstruction was to take place; whether we were informing ourselves as to the causes of the reverses which had been sustained during the course of the South African campaign; whether we were seriously addressing ourselves to the recruiting problem; whether we were forecasting the military needs of the Empire; whether we were elaborating a scheme of Imperial defence in which the colonies were to have a part, and which, as I understand the noble Duke, was to involve a system of training the Imperial Army partly upon the sea and partly in South Africa; and finally, whether we were going to submit the whole of our proposals to Parliament. I venture to say that in the history of Parliament so many formidable questions were never compressed into a speech so brief as that which the noble Duke has delivered. I cannot give the noble Duke information upon the whole of these points—upon some of them we do not possess the information ourselves; but if the object of the noble Duke is to obtain from me a general assurance that it is the intention of the Government to spare no effort to turn to account the experience acquired during the course of the present campaign, that assurance I give him in the strongest and most unqualified terms. I say, further, that if the conclusions to be derived from that experience are such as to lead to the belief that changes are necessary either in the organisation of the Army or in the system under which the Army is administered, we shall approach those questions with minds unbiassed by preconceived opinions, and with the determination to ask Parliament for the means of giving effect to any changes which may be proved to be necessary. But in a case of this kind it is surely true to say that the only solid foundation upon which we can set to work

a foundation of ascertained facts, and many of the facts we must perforce present be but imperfectly acquainted with the war is still in progress. Until facts have been ascertained I do not think it will be possible for me to give the noble Duke any information as to the extent to which either the reorganisation of the Army or the reconstruction of the War Office might possibly be desirable; less can I tell him, even in outline, upon what principles that reconstruction is likely to proceed. Reorganisation and reconstruction are very big words; they are words which seem to afford infinite consolation to the minds of many people who use them; but they are not only very big words, they are very vague words, and I confess I prefer not to use them until I have in my mind a clear idea of the meaning which I wish to convey by their use. That this war will lead to changes in the organisation of the Army, in its training and equipment, I feel myself very little doubt. But I would put it to the noble Duke and to your Lordships' House that we can scarcely condemn the whole of the old machinery, we can scarcely begin to construct new machinery, until we have made ourselves fully aware of the extent to which the old machinery has broken down, the points at which it has failed, and, above all, whether the failure has been due to imperfections of the machinery itself or to errors on the part of those who had control of and directed its operations. While the war in South Africa is still in progress we cannot obtain evidence upon many of these points. We cannot yet obtain a class of evidence to which I, for my part, attach very great importance—I mean the evidence not of the critics, but of the men who have seen the conduct of these operations upon the spot, and to whom the success or failure of the present system has been a matter of life or death. When the campaign is over, as we all hope it will be before long, we shall, I have no doubt, have ample opportunities of conferring with distinguished soldiers who will be able to give us most valuable evidence on points of that kind. I would add that where the war has taught us already a lesson which appeared to us clear and unmistakable we have not hesitated to take action. I cite in support of this what we are doing in regard to the increase and rearmament of the artillery, which is already proceeding; I cite also the large measures which are now in progress for building up a sufficient reserve of military stores and equipment of all kinds, stores which have, in my opinion, at no time been maintained at a sufficient amount, and which we mean to accumulate in large quantities, and under conditions which I hope will render it incumbent not only upon us, but upon those who may follow us to make good at once any deficiency in those reserves created by the exceptional demands of a great campaign. The noble Duke indicated not obscurely his own preference for an external inquiry of some kind. I should like to throw out for his consideration, and that of those who believe that Committees and Commissions are a panacea for all the ills of the body politic, this reflection—if you wish for speedy and effectual improvements, are you quite sure that inquiry by Royal Commission is the best way of obtaining it? When you have collected those men of sound common sense—who, the experience of the last few days seems to show, are either very rare or very reluctant to place their services at the disposal of the country—they are apt to proceed with very great deliberation and care. The result is, a long time passes while the inquiry is proceeding, and you are very fortunate indeed if you get advice on which you can act at once without further delay and without further investigation. With regard to the noble Duke's suggestion that whatever we may determine to do should be fully submitted to the judgment of Parliament, I cannot conceive that any considerable changes either in Army organisation or administration should be made except under conditions which would leave to Parliament the fullest opportunity of criticism and review. I feel perfectly confident that whatever is done the noble Duke and other Members of the House who take an active interest in the affairs of the Army will not be denied the amplest opportunity of discussing and considering our proposals.

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I think we ought to be very grateful to the noble Duke for having brought this subject forward. I think we may also congratulate ourselves on the fact that the criticisms of the War Office and our generals in the field have been free from the party spirit which marked the time of the great Duke of Wellington and the Crimean war. No doubt that has been brought about, to a great extent, by modern facilities of communication. We now have the telegraph at work, and any criticism that is made here is immediately reported, not only to our generals, who may be affected, but also to our opponents in the field. As I have said, I think it is a matter of congratulation that this change has taken place. But at the same time it is imperative on the Government to look facts in the face and see, not only what defects exist in the organisation of the Army at home, but what militates against success in carrying on war in a foreign country. No doubt things have taken place which show the necessity for changes. We think that the opportunity must be seized to look into these matters in time of peace, in order to make such arrangements as will prevent their recurrence. We shall probably be obliged to keep a considerable force in South Africa for some time to come, but the training of the Army will surely take place in England rather than in South Africa. I can hardly think that the noble Duke means that the main instruction should be given to our Army in South Africa. The noble Duke seems to look for some Commission or inquiry independent of Her Majesty's Government. I venture to differ from him entirely in that. I think the Government of the day themselves must be responsible for a thorough, entire, and complete investigation into the management of the war, and if they do not deal with it completely and satisfactorily it will be for Parliament to take vigorous action if they consider the action of the Government is not sufficient. I hope no Commission will be appointed, and that the Government will investigate the whole matter themselves.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I am very glad to find myself in agreement with the Secretary of State for War on two points. He said that reorganisation and reconstruction were two very large words, and with that description I agree. I think the noble Duke has done good service in bringing this matter forward, but I agree with the Secretary of State for War that the words reorganisation and reconstruction do not apply to the situation. Attention is required not to reconstruction and reorganisation, but to what is signified by another big word

Earl Spencer.

—namely, “administration.” I believe that our Army system is perfectly sound and sound if properly administered. We found ourselves in South Africa without big movable guns of position, as the Boers had; such, too, as we had through the taking of the Tientsin arsenal, that the Chinese have in readiness. And had it not been for naval guns, thirty-five of which were borrowed from the Navy and made available by Captain Scott—a service which a C.B. appears to be a poor reward—we should, as President Kruger intended, have been driven into the sea. The irony of the situation is that in 1860 big movable guns of position were the improvement in the field gun, and these obsolete, and no step had been taken in time to this been taken to obtain a movable gun of position, the up-to-date equivalent of the gun of position. Now, this is an administrative deficiency. It is not, I repeat, a question of reconstruction or reconstruction, but of administration. There is someone responsible for the organisation of the War Office deficiency. That man ought to be removed and hanged.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, I wish to say a word on a subject which has not been dealt with—namely, the pressing need of attention being given to the question of remounts. This has been essentially a cavalry question again and again throughout the war. We have seen our cavalry helpless from want of horses. Porter's Brigade was sent to the assistance of Buller at Koornspruit, and which should have had 1,500 men, arrived with only 300, and I am told that the horses they did have were not capable of standing a three days march. I believe that many of the difficulties regard to remounts might have been avoided if proper arrangements had been made in the past for the supply of horses as they were required. We should have done much better if, before the war, horses had been gathered in Africa ready for them. Even in this case the whole system of the purchase of mounts has been one which would commend itself to impartial inquiry. Observers; £30 and £40 have been horses which turned out useless in South Africa, quite breaking down under severe test applied to them. I hope the question of remounts will be carefully considered into, because in the immediate future, more than in the past, our success on the battlefield will depend on the efficiency of our cavalry.

THE MARQUESS OF GRANBY: My Lords, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War justly took upon his department credit for the greatly improved condition of stores and equipment—

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: That I said was that our reserves of military stores had, in my opinion, never been as large as they should have been, and that we were already, as one of the seasons of the war, greatly increasing the amount of those reserves.

THE MARQUESS OF GRANBY: I apologise for not quoting the noble Marquess correctly, but we mean very much the same thing. I would point out that there are deficiencies still existing in regard to our troops at home. I am cognisant myself of one regiment of Volunteers, consisting of two battalions, which is going into camp within the next ten days. They would go in 1,500 strong, but are 350 rifles short. A recruit without a rifle is not much good, and I think this is a point which deserves the careful attention of the War Office.

LORD HENEAGE: My Lords, I should like to ask why faith has not been kept with the Militia regiments embodied in the spring in the matter of tents. At the present moment, instead of every officer having a tent to himself, as Volunteer officers have when they are sent into camp, two officers have to go into one tent. Exactly the same thing happens with regard to the men in their proportions, and the men have been crowded to a far greater extent than was anticipated. I should like to support the observations of Lord Tweedmouth. There cannot be the slightest doubt that over and over again troops in South Africa have been obliged to stand still because they had no horses for the cavalry, and when they had them, many of the horses could not do the work. I venture to say that in the recent marches in the Transvaal there have been more horses tethered behind wagons without saddles than there have been with men on their backs. I hope the question of remounts will be one to which the Government will give their earliest attention.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: It does not, I am sorry to say, at all surprise me to find that there has been a short supply of tents, and that consequently the men have been crowded into a less number of tents than would otherwise have been the case. The difficulty of obtaining tents is enormous. The number of contractors who are able to supply tents of suitable quality is very limited indeed, and if my noble friend is able to put me in the way of discovering new sources of supply from which additional tents can be obtained he will earn my gratitude and that of the Director-General of Ordnance, who for many months past has been at his wits end over this question. With regard to remounts, I am quite ready to believe that the experience of this war may have some very valuable and instructive results; but I rather wish to demur to the suggestion made by the noble Lord on the front bench opposite (Lord Tweedmouth), and, I think, repeated by the noble Lord below the gangway (Lord Heneage), that because at particular moments our troops had been brought to a standstill for the want of horses, that was necessarily due to shortcomings in the supply of remounts. We all know that for many weeks Lord Roberts was dependent for all his supplies upon a single line of railway, and that it was only with the greatest difficulty, in the earlier days after his arrival at Bloemfontein, and again at Pretoria, that he was able to secure for his troops the food and forage which was essential for their existence. It was perfectly well known that at that moment he was unable to get up the horses which were actually in the Cape Colony, as they had either to travel on their legs or to wait until other more important stores and equipments had been conveyed to the front. With regard to the complaint of my noble friend below the gangway (the Marquess of Granby), I am afraid that it may be the case that the corps in which he is interested have had to wait for rifles; but the noble Marquess must be aware that the demands on the Ordnance Department have been enormous of late, and it is quite conceivable that from entirely unavoidable circumstances rifles may not have been supplied as punctually as would otherwise be the case.

GIBRALTAR, MALTA, AND HONG KONG — DOCK ACCOMMODATION — NEW WORKS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: My Lords, I rise to ask Her Majesty's Government whether information can be supplied respecting the present condition and progress of the new works at Gibraltar dockyard and breakwater; and whether the proposed new docks at Malta and Hong Kong are in progress. I am sorry to have to trouble the noble Earl who represents the Admiralty in this House, and who, I am sure, we all congratulate on the very high position to which he has been appointed;* but I am obliged to do so owing to the Naval Estimates not being supplied to this House. The three docks at Gibraltar are, I understand, still under construction, and only one is capable of receiving a first-class ironclad. Since the zealous and able administration of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Spencer), we have been promised an additional dock at Malta, where there are at present four docks, but only one of which, I think, is capable of receiving the large vessels now built for the Navy. This is the only accommodation we have for the largely increased number of ships we are obliged to maintain in the Mediterranean. The breakwater is another question on which I desire information. It must be obvious to everyone of your Lordships that the dock accommodation for our squadrons ought to be very greatly increased, more especially when we look at the fact that a foreign nation has very large dock accommodation at three or four ports in the Mediterranean. It is necessary that we should have accommodation for the repair of our ships in case of emergency. The docks at Gibraltar not being ready, we should have to fall back upon the small accommodation which Malta provides. A promise was also made of a dock at Hong Kong. So far as I can ascertain there is only one dock there, and that is not capable of receiving vessels of the size we are now sending out to the East.

* It was announced on the 14th July that the Earl of Hopetoun had been appointed first Governor-General of the Commonwealth of Australia.

The Marquess of Lansdowne.

THE EARL OF HOPETOUN Lords, full information as to the made with these works up to the February of this year will be found in the First Lord's statement accompanying the Naval Estimates for 1900-1.* Since that time a further length of 1,000 feet has been detached mole at Gibraltar has been brought above water level. The No. 3 Dock has been completed, the enclosed area is being pumped out, and progress made with the works; the progress is satisfactory. It is not expected that a contract for the construction of docks at Malta will be let before the next year, but in the meantime the levelling and levelling of the site is proceeding rapidly. At Hong Kong the works are in process of construction, but a dock cannot be begun until further progress has been made with the re-

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, it is absolutely essential, in view of the increased number of ships kept in the Mediterranean, that there should be increased accommodation both at Gibraltar, it can hardly be expected that we should have at those places as good as that which they have in the same waters, for your ships must remember that these are the home dockyards of France, which correspond to Plymouth and Portsmouth in this country. With regard to Hong Kong, everybody must admit, in view of the lamentable circumstances which have recently occurred in the immense importance of keeping a sufficient fleet in those seas. At the works at Hong Kong, I confess I am not altogether satisfied with the progress taken for them, and I am still afraid that the site will not be so large as to give all the accommodation which will be required in the near future. At the present moment, as I understand, Her Majesty's Government are proposing to build another dock at Victoria on the Hong Kong side of the bay, but I would like to know from the noble Earl whether it is intended that it should accommodate the largest cruiser or ship of the present day.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: The Earl did not say when the works at Gibraltar were likely to be completed.

* See The Parliamentary Debates Series, Vol. lxxix., Appendix.

when one of the docks was likely to be used.

THE EARL OF HOPETOUN: I am glad, with the knowledge which is at my disposal, that I cannot answer either of the questions which have been put to me.

DEATH CERTIFICATION.

LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords, I wish to call attention to the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1893 on Death Certification, stating that "the existing procedure plays into the hands of the criminal classes"; and to ask whether the Government propose to introduce legislation in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee. I do not propose to go further back into the history of this matter than 6th January, 1893, when Mr. Asquith, who was then Home Secretary, received a deputation consisting of, amongst others, the eminent surgeon, Sir Henry Thompson, who made a speech in which he showed that the state of the law with regard to death certification was extremely inefficient, and, indeed, dangerous to the public safety. He showed that a large number of burials took place without any death certificate being produced at all; that in Edinburgh, for instance, as many as 8 per cent. of the burials were uncertificated; that in the remoter parts of Scotland between 25 and 45 per cent. of burials were of persons whose deaths had not been certified; and that in a great many cases the certificates when produced were absolutely valueless, as they were either given by incompetent persons or by competent persons on insufficient information. Mr. Asquith was very much impressed with the statement of Sir Henry Thompson, and he formed a Select Committee of the House of Commons to take the matter into consideration. Sir Walter Foster, who was then Secretary to the Local Government Board, was in the chair, and the Committee, in the course of their Report, used the words which I have put into my motion. They said that—

"The existing procedure plays into the hands of the criminal classes."

They also said—

"The Committee are much impressed with the serious possibilities implied in a system which permits death and burial to take place without the production of satisfactory evidence of the cause of death. . . . Your Committee are convinced that vastly more deaths occur annually from foul play and criminal neglect than the law recognises."

In 1896, Sir Richard Quain, as President of the General Medical Council, had a correspondence on the subject with the Registrar General, but all he could get out of him was an acknowledgment that the law was in an exceedingly bad state. Nothing could be done at that time. In May, 1899, the General Medical Council again took the matter up, and the following resolution was passed—

"That the President be authorised to forward to the Registrar General the whole of the correspondence that has passed on the subject of death certification, and to make further representations to the Registrar General as to the importance and urgency of the question."

Since my notice has been on the Paper I have had a letter from the master of the workhouse of St. Olave's Union, Bermondsey, stating that he is exceedingly dissatisfied with the present state of the law. I do not think the remedy that ought to be applied is far to seek. There is another part of the Report of the Committee that I ought to read as bearing upon the remedy. With regard to the practice of cremation the Committee say—

"Your Committee are of opinion that with the precautions adopted in connection with cremation as carried out by the Cremation Society, there is little probability that cases of crime would escape detection."

The question I should like to ask the Local Government Board is this: Why should the law efficiently protect only members of the Cremation Society? Mr. Asquith considered that the time was ripe for legislation, and in 1895, before he quitted office, he had, I understand, given some consideration to the preparation of a Bill on this matter. I do not, of course, suggest that Her Majesty's Government should introduce legislation this session; but I understand that the usual way in which Ministers spend their vacation is in considering legislation that they wish to bring forward in the following session. I have no reason to suppose that on this occasion Ministers will not comply with that time-honoured custom, and I hope that while they are giving the question of legislation their best consideration they will also consider the question of efficient death certificates worthy of their attention.

LORD HARRIS: My Lords, I am not prepared to say how the President of the Local Government Board intends to spend the next vacation, nor, indeed, am I in a position to say how he has spent past vacations. But I can assure the noble Lord that this matter, which undoubtedly is a very important one, has engaged Mr. Chaplin's attention for some time with a view to bringing in a Bill. There are, however, a good many difficulties connected with it, and he is at present having inquiry made by the officers of the Local Government Board with a view to getting over those difficulties which have presented themselves at different times to those who were anxious to legislate on the subject. He is in hopes that at no very distant date he will see a way of overcoming those difficulties, and be able to introduce a Bill on the lines suggested by the noble Lord.

LORD MONKSWELL: I should have been glad if the noble Lord had specified the difficulties which he says stand in the way of legislation on this question. I cannot understand how there can be any difficulties.

House adjourned at Five minutes before Six of the clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten of the clock.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

GAS ORDER CONFIRMATION (No. 2) BILL [Lords] (BY ORDER.)

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [3rd July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Doogan.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): It will be in the recollection of the House—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman has already spoken on this motion, and he can now only do so by the indulgence of the House.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I am pleading for that indulgence. When this matter was before the House a fortnight ago, I suggested an adjournment, in order that negotiations might go forward for the purchase of the gas company's undertaking, and I wish now to state that, although originally the local authority offered £7,000 and the company asked for £9,000, that during the interval the council have raised their offer to £8,000 and the company have reduced their demand to £8,500, so that now there is only a difference of £500 between the parties. Although I have worked very hard, I have failed to get rid of that difference, and the Order must, therefore, now be either approved or rejected by the House. I should like to say that the Order is a very serious matter for the town, because it fixes the capital of the company at £9,000, the maximum price to be charged at 5s. 10d. per 1,000 feet, and the maximum dividend at 10 per cent. So far as I am personally concerned I intend to vote against the Second Reading of the Bill, because it will put the town in such a bad position. I think the municipality is entitled to some consideration at the hands of this House, and as this is not a Government matter, and as Irish representatives, north and south, are unanimous on the point, I shall vote against the confirmation of the Order.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I only wish to say a few words. The case is an exceedingly hard one for the citizens of Dungannon. They have been charged for many years a price for gas which is considerably above that charged in other towns in Ireland or even in Great Britain. This Provisional Order proposes to maintain the enormous maximum price of 5s. 10d., whereas in neighbouring places it varies from 3s. 6d. to 4s., and that is done solely for the purpose of ensuring the payment of the maximum dividend of 10 per cent. on an inflated capital. In the last debate it was clearly shown that the actual expenditure from the pockets of the shareholders had been only £4,200, the remainder of the money expended on works having been taken out of the profits in excess of the 10 per cent. That had been done by charging an enormous price for gas, and the ratepayers of Dungannon are now asked to give the company twice as much as they have had to pay out of their own pockets. In the event if this Order is confirmed they will continue to pay 5s. 10d. per 1,000 feet in gas, so that the shareholders may get 10 per cent. on their inflated capital. I hope, therefore, the motion for Second Reading will be rejected.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): Rather than reject the Bill to-day, why not pass the Second Reading, let the negotiations be continued, and then if no agreement is arrived at settle the contentious point on the motion for Third Reading?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I cannot consent to that. The end of the session is so near that there would not be sufficient time to discuss the matter, should it on the Third Reading be found necessary to recommit the Bill. No one can be prejudiced if the Order is now thrown out. The whole matter can come up again next session.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley): In the absence of the President of the Board of Trade I was requested to move the Second Reading of this Bill. Of course it is not a Government matter in any way, but I think it right that the House should know the reasons why the Board of Trade granted this Provisional Order. The points which have been raised could be easily settled by the Committee upstairs.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No, it goes before the Unopposed Bills Committee.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: That difficulty could easily be got over by suspension of Standing Orders, and then the local authorities of Dungannon could have a full and fair hearing. This company has for many years been supplying gas in Dungannon without any statutory powers whatever. It had, therefore, no power to break up the streets without the consent of the local authority. The Board of Trade sent down a Special Commissioner to inquire whether there were good grounds for the Order, and he reported in favour of it. Seeing that the parties have so nearly come to an agreement as to the terms of purchase, surely it would be well to let the matter be threshed out by a Committee upstairs. If the Order is thrown out, matters, as far as the supply of gas is concerned, will be at a deadlock.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No, no!

MR. DILLON: The company and the town will be left in exactly the position they have occupied for the last ten years.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: In case of accident they will be unable to touch a main or pipe, unless the local authority consents. There has been no friction for the last ten years; the company and the local authority have been able to work together. But will they be able to do so in the future? I think it will be better for both the local authority and the Council that this Order should be sent to a Committee upstairs, for that is the only tribunal which can properly settle the points in dispute.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): I propose to vote against this Order. The arguments of the right hon. Gentleman have made no impression on me. No one will be damaged if the Order is lost, for matters will remain in precisely the same position as prior to its introduction, while between now and next year there will be ample opportunity for settling the question in dispute as to the value of the undertaking. I hope, therefore, the House will reject the Order.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhamton, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has any news from China to communicate to the House.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BROD-RICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have received no information in the last twenty-four hours either from the Consul at Tientsin or from the Commanding Officer, nor have we received any information from Shanghai of the reports which have reached that city of attacks on Tientsin by the allies. I see there are reports both ways, one of failure and the more recent one of successful attack.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the British Legation at Peking was standing on the 9th inst. ?

MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Member has given me no notice of the question, but we have no confirmation of the statement.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that His Excellency Li Hung Chang left Canton this morning for Peking with the view of taking supreme command in China ?

[The question was not answered.]

DESPATCH OF INDIAN TROOPS TO CHINA.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the force of British and Native troops under orders for China has been again increased. What is now the total strength of the withdrawals from the Indian Establishment for service abroad, and whether the Viceroy is satisfied that all these troops can be spared. And whether the present Acting Commander-in-Chief in India is a member of the Viceroy's executive council, which issues orders for the despatch of troops on foreign service.

The following question on the same subject also appeared on the Paper:—

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether it is intended to despatch from India additional British and Native regiments for service in China, and what steps are being taken to supply the place of these and the other forces now serving out of India.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Faling): Since I last replied to the hon. Member's enquiries on the subject (21st and 26th June)† it has been decided to increase the strength of the force proceeding from India to China by about 6,000 men, which, with the exception of two batteries of artillery, is entirely drawn from the Native Army. This raises the total number of troops withdrawn from the Indian Establishment for service in China and elsewhere to about 22,000. These movements have the full concurrence of the Viceroy. The provisional Commander-in-Chief in India is not a member of the Viceroy's executive council, but he is the adviser of the Viceroy on military questions.

MR. BUCHANAN. Then there is no truth in the statement that no British regiments are included in the division.

LORD G. HAMILTON: It is a mere newspaper rumour.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Upon which exchequer will the cost fall—the Imperial or the Indian?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice must be given of that question.

THE YANG-TSZE CABLE.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what financial arrangement has been made with regard to the strategic cable about to be laid from the Island of Gutzlaff, at the mouth of the south channel of the Yang-tsze, to the north; and whether, having regard to the fact that the island is the landing-place of the cables of the Danish Great Northern Telegraph Company running to Nagasaki and Vladivostock, it is arranged that the offices at the end of the new line will be in British hands, and distinct from the offices in which his clerks are employed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, W.): The proposed cable to Weiwei is not to be laid from Gutzlaff from the Saddle Islands, which are thirty miles further seawards. The Great Northern Company has no station on these islands. Arrangements will be made for the working of the new cable by a British staff. Negotiations are in progress with the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company as to the ownership of the cable. Pending the result the company will lay and work the line.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—COMPENSATION TO LOYALISTS IN NATAL.

SIR ANDREW SCOBLE (Hackney, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is intended to compensate loyal residents in Natal for the injury done to their property by the recent Boer occupation; what steps have been taken to ascertain the amount of compensation due to the residents; whether prompt payment will be made to those whose claims are established; and whether such compensation will be paid out of the funds of the colony; and whether it is proposed to make any grant from Imperial funds in order to secure that immediate adequate compensation may be afforded in all proper cases.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Her Majesty's Government have pledged themselves to compensation for loyal residents for losses. A Commission was appointed by the Governor in December last to inquire as to direct losses in the districts, and is still engaged in its duties. The Colonial Government have taken to advance compensation an amount not exceeding 75 per cent. of the valuation as assessed by the Commission in cases where it can be proved that claimants are in urgent need of financial assistance. Compensation will to the extent be advanced out of Colonial funds, on the understanding that ultimate compensation will be paid out of indemnity to be exacted from the Orange River Colony and the Transvaal. A grant from Imperial funds is contemplated in these circumstances.

† See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxxiv., p. 626 and 1122.

MARTIAL LAW—ADMINISTRATION.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there are any civil prison in the Cape Colony, and, if any, how many persons detained by sentences of courts martial.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have no information, I am sorry to say; but if the hon. Gentleman desires, I will communicate with Sir Alfred Milner. It will, however, take some time.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: I think it would be interesting to have the information.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Why not communicate by telegraph?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir Alfred Milner is already subjected to tremendous strain, and I do not like to add to the pressure unnecessarily. I will communicate by despatch, however.

COURTS-MARTIAL SENTENCES.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether persons sentenced by courts-martial in the Cape Colony to terms of imprisonment or penal servitude are detained in civil or in military prisons; and, if they are detained in civil prisons, whether the warrants are signed by civil or by military officers.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The records of proceedings under martial law have not reached this country. I understand, however, that, except for minor breaches of military regulations, there have been very few cases finally decided by military courts. No sentence of penal servitude has been confirmed. I presume that the warrants are signed by the presiding officer, and that the prisoner after sentence is confined in some suitable place within the limits of the area over which martial law has been proclaimed.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: In civil or military custody?

MR. WYNDHAM: I should say in military custody.

VOL. LXXXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I promised to announce at the earliest opportunity the additional names for the Commission to inquire into the arrangements for the sick and wounded in South Africa. I am glad to say we have obtained the services of Sir David Richmond, ex-Lord Provost of Glasgow, a respected gentleman and deeply versed in administrative affairs, and Mr. Harrison, general manager of the London and North-Western Railway. I am particularly glad we have got Mr. Harrison to serve, seeing that questions of transport are clearly of great importance, and his name will, I think, carry universal weight with all acquainted with railway management.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): Will the right hon. Gentleman give us any opportunity of discussing these names or the constitution of the Committee of Inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: Then I beg to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House in order to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the constitution and scope of the Committee of Inquiry.

MR. SPEAKER: It is somewhat difficult to remember the exact course of events, but I believe I am right in saying that a motion for the adjournment of the House was made on 5th July by the hon. Member for Northampton, in order to discuss the composition and scope of reference of the Committee appointed to inquire into the treatment of the sick and wounded in South Africa.† On that motion a discussion took place upon scope of reference and the three names then placed before the House. I do not think that a renewed discussion upon those three names would be in order. It is a well-known rule that the same matter cannot be discussed twice on a motion of adjournment under Standing Order 17. But as regards the two new names now added, it will lie with the House and not with me to say whether they shall discuss them or not. If the hon. Member cares to alter his motion in this way—namely, to discuss the nomination of Sir D. Richmond and Mr. Harrison as members of the Committee of Inquiry, such a motion would be in order.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: May I respectfully remind you, Sir, that on the occasion referred to I stated that I had an objection to one of the names, but no discussion of that objection or name took place. The discussion took a wider scope, and had reference to the large element of the medical profession on the Commission. I now propose to deal with an entirely new matter.

*MR. SPEAKER: I look at the subject-matter proposed for discussion; I have really nothing to do with the particular arguments that have been used. The matter proposed for discussion was the composition and scope of reference of the Committee appointed to inquire into the treatment of sick and wounded soldiers, it being proposed that the Committee should consist of a certain learned judge and two members of the medical profession. The question of the composition of the Committee so far as those three gentlemen were concerned was open and was discussed. I think it would be quite contrary to the rules of the House, especially in a matter of such a personal bearing, if three names which were discussed by the House on one occasion were re-discussed on a motion for the adjournment without any alteration of the circumstances with regard to those three names.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: With all respect, I submit that new circumstances have since arisen with respect to Professor Cunningham. I am in the recollection of the House when I say that the First Lord on the last occasion threatened to withdraw his name if there was any discussion on it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never said anything of the kind.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Since then the charge has been openly made that Professor Cunningham has been recommended by those who are interested in the issue of the inquiry.

*MR. SPEAKER: The names were before the House. It is almost inevitable that some further arguments should have occurred to some hon. Member's minds, but that does not alter the fact that this matter has been discussed in the House under Standing Order 11 regarding those three gentlemen. The two names can be discussed if the Member wishes.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: The Lord of the Treasury stated in due terms that neither of the two gentlemen had any connection with the Army Medical Department. Subsequently it became known that one of the gentlemen held a paid appointment in connection with the Army Medical Department.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am quite sure the whole matter was open to discussion, though, of course, it is impossible for every hon. Member that every one was present in his mind then was present in his mind now. I must refer to what I have said, that if the Member asks leave to move the amendment in order to discuss two names for the first time before the House is a matter which I am prepared to submit to the House.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: As the ruling makes it impossible for me to bring before the House new matter of interest, I must beg leave to withdraw.

PRETORIA—ATTEMPT TO BLOW UP MAGAZINE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilke): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has any information to the effect that Lieutenant Toss of the Transvaal Police, and Mr. Sol Gillingham have been condemned to death in Pretoria for alleged complicity in blowing up the magazine; and what he can say if Mr. Gillingham holds a military rank in the Republican Army, what is his occupation, and when the trial took place, before what tribunal, and what was the evidence of guilt, and what sentence is to be carried into effect.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no information at the War Office in regard to the matters referred to in the question.

L ARTILLERY—SECOND LIEUTENANTS.

BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg the Under Secretary of State for whether he is aware that many lieutenants in the Royal Artillery who have had two years training at Woolwich and have served nearly three in the artillery, are not allowed to the full rank of lieutenant, while now joining the artillery direct school with no training at Woolwich, are made full lieutenants in three; and whether steps will be taken to remedy this state of things.

WYNDHAM: Time spent at the Military Academy, Woolwich, is admitted to reckon as Army service. The Secretary of State for War sees no objection for making any alteration in this.

BATTALIONS—BAND AND MESS EXPENSES.

RENTOUL (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for whether he will state, in the case of new Line battalions now being raised, what are the approximate total expenses of equipping the band with instruments, furnishing and equipping the mess necessities; whether these expenses are to be borne by the officers of each battalion, or does the Government contribute to them or make any contribution to them; and if any contribution is made by Government, what is its amount.

WYNDHAM: The cost varies in different regiments, but is believed to be, on the average, to about £1,000. The contribution from the Government is

The question whether this contribution should be increased is under consideration.

MILITIA—FURLOUGH PAY.

JOHN DORINGTON (Gloucester-Tewkesbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether men of the embodied Militia going on furlough have their pay deducted, whilst men of the Regular forces going on furlough continue to draw pay; and, if so, whether there is any reason for this difference of treat-

MR. WYNDHAM: The rule has been as stated by the hon. Member, because the case contemplated was that of a Militiaman sent on furlough as soon as he joined, and therefore not disturbed in his civil occupation. But furlough with pay is now granted to Militiamen belonging to corps which have been some time embodied.

NAVY—CORDITE POWDER—EROSION OF GUNS.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the erosion of Naval guns by cordite is now being considered by a Committee; and, if so, of whom that Committee consists.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. The Committee consists of Lord Rayleigh (president), Sir W. Roberts-Austen, Sir W. Crookes, Sir Andrew Noble, and Mr. R. P. Haldane, M.P.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): Will this Committee have special regard to the erosion of guns on active service in South Africa?

MR. WYNDHAM: I have not the terms of reference before me, but I should say that the effect on guns in South Africa will be considered by them.

PICRIC ACID.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the plant for the manufacture of picric acid in this country is considered by the Admiralty to be sufficient to meet the strain of naval war, and whether any steps are being taken to increase it.

MR. WYNDHAM: I think this is a question that I should answer. The plant in this country is now sufficient to meet the needs of both services, and to provide for the accumulation of large reserves; but in order to meet needs even in excess of that standard, steps are being continually taken to increase the available plant; three new factories have recently been started.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: But is it not the case that picric acid cannot be kept in reserve?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I imagine it can be kept for some time, or the word "reserves" would not be used.

ADMIRALTY COAL CONTRACTS.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, in view of his statement that it was proposed before the next emergency coal contracts were made to revise some of the conditions, if he can state what alterations were made in the conditions of the contracts recently entered into by the Admiralty.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (MR. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): No alterations were made in the emergency coal contracts recently entered into, as it was not considered desirable at the present juncture to vary the conditions.

MR. D. A. THOMAS: But did not the First Lord promise to alter the contracts?

MR. MACARTNEY: He promised to consider the point. He did so, and it was not deemed desirable to make the alteration at the present juncture.

BELLEVILLE BOILERS—ADMIRALTY TESTS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has considered the statement at page 6 of the Memorandum respecting water-tube boilers, that in the manœuvres of 1899 the Belleville-boiler ship "Europa" made good her defects with her own resources, and that all four Belleville-boiler ships "Europa," "Argonaut," "Gladiator," and "Vindictive," maintained a speed of seventeen knots except during fogs; and does this statement agree with the report of Admiral Domville respecting the behaviour of these ships during the manœuvres in question; were Fleet artificers other than her own employed in remedying defects on board the "Europa" during these manœuvres; and if so, how many and for how long; and did Admiral Domville report as to the "Europa" that even after the repairs had been made she could not steam eleven knots, and did he make a similar report as to the "Argonaut"; if not, what did he report as to the speed of these ships during the manœuvres of 1899.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's Hanover Square): Admiral Domville's report with regard to the "Europa's" defects during the manœuvres of 1899 was as follows—

"On the 18th July, during the preliminary cruise, the captain of the 'Argonaut' reported that, owing to leakage and loss of water caused by fractured pipes and leaky boiler doors, the ship was unable to steam at full speed, or even more than ten knots. The 'Europa' was in a minor degree the same. On arrival at Milford thirty-one artificers of the Fleet were employed in remaking pipes, etc., of the 'Argonaut,' the 'Europa' making good her defects with her own artificers."

In the captain of "Europa's" report it is stated the boilers worked very satisfactorily, without any hitch, no doors or boiler tubes giving out. Admiral Domville did not report that the "Europa" could not steam eleven knots after repairs. I further report on the speed of the "Argonaut" was made than that given above.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, W.R., Shipley): How long did the repairs to the "Argonaut" occupy?

MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot say from memory, but it was a very short time.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I understand from the answer to the second paragraph that the "Europa" only employed her own artificers to remedy the defects.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; her own.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can explain the statement at page 6 of the Memorandum on Water-tube Boilers, that the Belleville boiler ships "Europa," "Argonaut," and "Vindictive," maintained a speed of 17 knots except during fogs, by stating the number of hours during which that speed was actually maintained by them, and the number of hours during which the fire necessitated a lesser rate of speed, and what that lesser rate was; and whether in view of the fact that in their trials the "Europa" attained a speed of 20.4 knots, the "Argonaut" a speed of 21.16 knots, and the "Vindictive" a speed of 22 knots, the attainment by these ships of 17 knots satisfies the Admiralty requirements.

MR. GOSCHEN: The portions of the report of the captain of the "Europa" was senior officer of the cruiser squadron, dealing with the question of speed, are as follows—

"I proceeded to sea for convoy in Her Majesty's ship under my command with 'Argonaut,' 'Gladiator,' 'Vindictive,' 'St. George,' 'Diana,' and 'Sappho,' at five a.m. on the 30th July.

Proceeding at 17 knots 'Sappho' soon began to drop, complaining of priming. She was sent back to join your flag.

"We had to ease to 12 knots in the afternoon, as the 'Argonaut' had an indicator-pipe started; soon after, at 5.38 p.m., we ran into heavy fog. This necessitated easing to 8 knots, and again to 8 knots for a short time, as the ships were inclined to separate; emerging at 7.48 p.m., speed was worked up to 17 knots until 1.8 a.m., when another dense fog was run into, decreasing from 17 to 10 knots. The positions of ships were well maintained, with the exception of 'Gladiator.' Emerging at 2.58 a.m., speed was increased to 17 knots, and maintained right through until meeting the convoy at 5.33 p.m. on 31st July."

The speed of 17 knots is a good one for a squadron of six cruisers to maintain, and was no doubt determined by the Admiral's orders, having regard to their coal supply, and the nature of the operations. The Admiral would naturally not order them to go at the maximum speed of the fastest ship, except in chase.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I suppose I may assume that 17 knots satisfies the Admiralty requirements?

MR. GOSCHEN: Generally speaking 17 knots is a high speed for a cruising squadron.

BELLEVILLE BOILERS—USE IN THE MERCANTILE MARINE.

MR. DAVID MACIVER (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the use of Belleville boilers has in this country been entirely discarded in the steamers of the mercantile marine; and, if not, can he give the names of any British trading steamers which are so fitted.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley) (for MR. RITCHIE): The Board of Trade are not aware of any vessel in the British mercantile marine that is fitted with Belleville boilers.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING—RELIEF OF COOMASSIE.

MR. DRAGE (Derby): Has the Secretary of State for the Colonies any news from Coomassie?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have received the following telegram from the Commandant at the Base at Cape Coast—

"Cape Coast, 17th July. — Apparently authentic information just received from Bekwai by messenger to Fumsu that Coomassie gave night signals: Relieved on 15th July."

This is the date on which Colonel Willcocks expected to carry out that relief. If the news is true, as I believe it is, I think it reflects the greatest credit on Colonel Willcocks and the forces under his command, who have been fighting under the most terrible conditions of climate and season.

INDIA—EDUCATION.

SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he will state the present number of technical, industrial, and Art schools or classes in India; the annual expenditure incurred by Government in maintaining the same; and what proportion such number and expenditure bear to those of colleges and schools of general education.

LORD G. HAMILTON: My hon. friend will find such figures as can be given, with a very full discussion of their bearing and effect in pages 248 to 281 of Mr. J. S. Cotton's Report on the progress of Education in India, 1892-93 to 1895-97, which was presented to Parliament in 1898. There may have been some progress since 1897, but I apprehend that the pressure of famine and plague in a large part of India has not admitted of increased expenditure on this object as a whole. My hon. friend will see from Mr. Cotton's remarks that it is not possible on the figures available to give separately the number and cost even of wholly technical institutions, inasmuch as many of the technical schools are grouped in the returns with other schools under the head of "Special Schools." As regards classes, the report shows that in every province attention is paid to the teaching of practical subjects, which may be described as preparatory technical instruction, in both primary and secondary schools. It is not, however, possible to show separately the expenditure in teaching these subjects, or the number of pupils attending the classes.

JAMAICA RAILWAY DEBENTURES—INCOME TAX.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any decision has been come to to refund the additional income tax charged at the rate of 1s. in the £ on the overdue interest on the debentures of the Jamaica Railway for the years 1897, 1898, and 1899, which was paid out of money supplied by Parliament last year, but the payment of which was withheld till May last.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have no doubt, after inquiry from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that the income tax of 1s. in the £ was legally charged in this case. The only ground, therefore, on which a claim for relief could be sustained is that suggested in the question that the payment of the interest was due while the income tax stood at 8d. in the £, and was delayed by the fault of the Colonial Government. I have ascertained from the Colonial Office that, under the arrangement made with the trustees of the bondholders, the latter did not become entitled to the payment of the arrears of interest and to the issue of inscribed stock in exchange for their bonds until the final decree of the Supreme Court of Jamaica in the matter was made—namely, on the 11th April, 1900—when the income tax stood at 1s. in the £, and that the Executive Government of Jamaica cannot be held in any way responsible for the delay, if any, in the issue of the decree. I do not, therefore, see any sufficient grounds for submitting a Vote to Parliament to defray the cost of the remissions desired, which would be the only legal mode of affording relief.

INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS.

MR. MACLEAN: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government has authorised the Bank of England to deduct income tax at the rate of 1s. in the £ from coupons or interest warrants maturing on or about the 1st of July instant, and whether the tax should not be levied at the rate of 8d. in the £ for interest which accrued during the first quarter of the year, and 1s. in the £ for the second quarter, or at an average rate of 10d. in the £ instead of 1s.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Dividends and interest from the public funds, foreign or colonial loans, or foreign colonial companies, and interest paid by local authorities to creditors on rates, are by law chargeable with income tax at the rate in force at the time when they become payable in this country, without regard to the period during which they have accrued. The Bank of England have been so informed by the Board of Inland Revenue, and are under obligation to deduct income tax accordingly. In other cases, such as mortgage interest and ground rents and the profits of public companies in the United Kingdom, income tax is deducted at an average rate based on the rates in force during the period in which the income taxed has been accruing, and if, in any such case, the business of deducting the income tax is conducted by the Bank of England, this principle would be followed.

WILLESDEN POOR LAW CHILDREN—RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the proceedings of the Willesden Board of Guardians on the 20th June last, during which it appears that the guardians made no appointment of a chaplain for Rockhall and Rockford House, but, instead, made arrangements with the ministers of various denominations to give religious instruction to the children under their charge in those establishments; whether the whole of these children are entered on the creed register as belonging to the Church of England; and, if so, whether this arrangement is in accordance with the regulation which requires that children in poor-law establishments should be brought up in the faith of their parents; and whether he proposes to take any action to remedy this state of things.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I have made inquiry on this subject, and I am informed that owing to the temporary nature of the institutions referred to and also to the small number of inmates, the guardians of opinion that the appointment of a chaplain is not requisite, but that arrangements could be made for voluntary religious instruction being given to the inmates. The clerk states that in preparing a rota of ministers he has taken consideration the fact that the majority of the inmates are described as Church of England, and that he has accordingly arranged with the vicar of the parish for the attendance at the two institutions of a minister of the Church of England at least once in each week. Ashford House only is provided as a home for children, and the regulations which the guardians have drawn up provide that the children shall attend divine service every Sunday at such places of worship in the neighbourhood as may be in conformity with the religious persuasion of the children. They also provide that no child under the age of twelve shall be permitted to receive religious instruction in variance with the creed under which he is registered in the creed register.

MR. TALBOT: Will the right hon. gentleman take care that this temporary arrangement is not made permanent?

MR. CHAPLIN: I will make it my business to use my influence to prevent that.

DUKINFIELD POSTMASTERSHIP.

MR. M'GHEE (Louth, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he can state the number of applicants for the postmastership of Dukinfield; and whether the questions of seniority and ability were considered before making the appointment.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The number of applicants was 112. He answer to the second paragraph of the question is in the affirmative.

LIVERPOOL TELEGRAPHISTS—PROMOTIONS.

MR. M'GHEE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that a telegraphist at the Liverpool Post Office, number 34 on the seniority list, has been promoted recently to the class of clerks; whether the men who were passed over received any notice of the impending promotion; and can he state the reasons for their non-advancement, and for what special circumstances the junior officer was selected.

MR. HANBURY: A sorting clerk and telegraphist, standing number 34 of his class at Liverpool, has lately been promoted to fill a vacant clerkship. The officers who were passed over did not receive notice that the promotion was under consideration. It is not the practice to issue any such notice, nor is it necessary to take such a course in order to ensure that the claims of all the men concerned receive proper consideration. The officer promoted was selected for the vacant post because he was held by the Postmaster General, after careful inquiry, to be the best qualified to perform the duties to be taken up.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the document which he described as the Queen's authority to the Historical Manuscripts Commissioners, which restricts their operations to manuscripts belonging to private persons; and whether the Trustees of the British Museum have taken any steps for the printing of any historical manuscripts acquired by them.

MR. HANBURY: I do not propose to lay the document formally upon the Table, but I shall be glad to show the right hon. Member a copy. It authorises and appoints certain Commissioners "to make inquiry into the places in which documents illustrative of history or of general public interest belonging to private owners are deposited." The British Museum only print and publish a few exceptional documents, but they regularly publish catalogues and indexes of all MSS. A forthcoming volume will include the Hardwicke papers, which were only bought in 1899 and were then in a state of chaos. Even while the MSS. are being sorted they are open to the inspection of scholars—and, of course, when sorted and catalogued they are open to the general reader. The catalogues and indexes are published and sold to the public.

JURY SERVICE—EXEMPTIONS— PAYMENT.

MR. BILLSON (Halifax): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will instruct sheriffs and coroners and their subordinates to omit from the list of persons liable to be summoned as jurymen all persons who have previously been excused from service on juries by reason of deafness or other physical defects; and whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to remunerate common as well as grand jurymen.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (for Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY): The Secretary of State has no authority to issue instructions of the nature indicated. The answer to the second paragraph is in the negative.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION—COST— RETURN.

MR. D. A. THOMAS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state when the Return relating to the expenses incurred in Private Bill Legislation ordered by the House on 28th April, 1899, is likely to be presented; and whether, having regard to the delay in its presentation, the information sought can be given to the end of last session.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (for Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY): There has been no undue delay in presenting this Return, considering the great labour and difficulties involved in communicating with 1,389 separate local authorities, and 1,050 companies. Even as it is, the Board of Trade have failed to obtain any figures from a considerable number of companies, and have been obliged to make up their part of the Return (with which they have only just been able to supply me) without them. The printing of this part of the Return will be proceeded with as speedily as possible; the rest of it is practically ready. To bring the Return down to the end of last session would involve a further long postponement. I told my hon. friend at the time the Return was granted that it would take a considerable time to prepare it.

VICTORIA AND ALBERT MUSEUM— ASSISTANTSHIPS.

MR. W. F. D. SMITH (Westminster): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education what candidates for the forthcoming examination for assistantships in the Victoria and Albert Museum are being selected for nomination; and, whether the system of nomination has been recently instituted for that of open competition; and, if so, can he say for what reason change has been made.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): Assistants in the Victoria and Albert Museum are a new class, as to be filled up by limited competition is done in a similar class in the Museum.

BOARDING OUT OF PAUP CHILDREN.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education what decision has been come to by the Committee of Council on Education with reference to the protest made to the President of the Council by the Executive Committee of the Association of Poor Law Unions against the regulation contained in the Boarding Out Regulations made by the Committee of Council on Education under the Elementary Education Act (Provisional and Epileptic Children) Act, 1897, that no child within that Act should be boarded out in a home in which any law child is boarded out by a board of guardians; and whether such regulation will be withdrawn, thereby removing the slur upon poor-law children.

SIR J. GORST: No slur upon poor-law children is either intended or conveyed by the regulation; but it is thought inexpedient for two separate distinct Government authorities to exercise jurisdiction in the same home.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—FEE GRANT.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that, in 1897, the Government allocated the money which was given to Scotland as against that given to England in the matter of the Voluntary Schools, the Scotch Office had estimated that a sum of £26,000 annually from Imperial funds would be required to maintain the Scotch fee grant.

holar, which he had agreed to pay t payment of the equivalent to our financial years ending 31st

, 1901, the amounts paid or estias requiring to be paid in respect above undertaking, instead of ting to £104,000, amount only to £5,000; and whether he will re-er this payment to Scotland.

M. HICKS BEACH: The answer first two paragraphs of the ques-in the affirmative; but this matter t been dealt with on the basis of lent grants since a fee grant of er child throughout the United om was substituted for the equivaant system in 1897. Up to that he Scotch Education Department aid a fee grant not of 10s. but of ven to Education in Scotland in ve undertook that if it failed any ney should be made up from the quer, to an extent which was esti-by the Scotch Office at £26,000 as

Scotch Local Taxation Fund has d that fund to bear the cost of the onal 2s. fee grant to Scotland, and cannot accept the view that we quired or not—but the fact that it ot been required might, I think, en into account to some extent sidering the proposals for further liture on Scottish Education that e brought before me.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—THE ULSTER CUSTOM.

SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lieutenant of Ireland whether his on has been directed to the case of
y. tenant, and Mrs. Corry, landecided by Mr. Justice Meredith at nd Commission Court at Dublin on y last, when a decision was come to the effect of which would be to make a sale on such an estate dependent on the Irish Land Act of 1881, and not on the Ulster custom, as has hitherto been believed to be the right of the Ulster tenant; and whether he will consider the advisability of amending the Irish Land Laws, so as to prevent the Ulster tenants from being deprived of the right of free sale under the Ulster custom.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRE-LAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The hon. Member misapprehends the facts. The sale was held to be a sale under the Ulster custom, one of the incidents of which is that the landlord should consent to the transaction to make it valid. In this case this consent had not been given, and the purchaser was accordingly decided not to be a tenant entitled to have his rent fixed.
The decision upholds the custom, and no legislation is necessary.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— INSPECTOR GENERAL.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lietenant of Ireland if he will state what are the special qualifications of Colonel Neville Chamberlain for appointment to the post of Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary; what previous experience (if any) he has of police duties and police administration; and on whose recommendation was he appointed Inspector General.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: In reply to the first two paragraphs of this question I have nothing to add to what I said in answer to the hon. Member yesterday, except that it has been the rule, and not the exception, since the post of Inspector General was created in 1836, to appoint military men to the position. With respect to the last paragraph, the Lord Lieutenant, of course, satisfied himself of Colonel Chamberlain's suitability for the post, but any recommendations he received must be treated as confidential.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: What previous experience had he had of police duties?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: No direct experience.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.E.): Is service in India or South Africa considered a qualification for controlling the Irish police?

MR. FLAVIN: Does he know how to put on a constabulary uniform?

DOWNPATRICK POSTMASTERSHIP.

MR. RENTOUL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that in recently appointing a postmaster for Rathfriland the appointment was given to a person residing in Downpatrick Street; and whether, seeing that that is an inconvenient locality for the post office, and that there were four applicants for the position whose houses are in the square where the chief business of the town is transacted, he can state the reasons for locating the post office in any other place than the square.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General was aware of the situation of the present sub-postmaster's premises when appointing him sub-postmaster of Rathfriland. He was considered to be the best qualified of the candidates, and was able to devote the whole of his time to the service of the Department, and this was regarded as more than counterbalancing any inconvenience that might be occasioned by the removal of the office to Downpatrick Street. A memorial was received signed by many influential residents of Rathfriland in favour of the candidate who was selected.

CLONES LEVEL CROSSING.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state when the Report promised upon the condition of the level crossing and of the island platform at Clones railway station, Great Northern Railway, Ireland, will be issued.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The Board of Trade have not yet received the Report, but they are pressing for it; and as soon as it is received they will communicate with the hon. Member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any Supplementary Civil Service Estimates are to be introduced this session.

MR. HANBURY: Supplementary Estimates will be presented for Services (Ashanti); for a contribution to the Local Taxation (Ireland) Act in respect of Pauper Lunatics; Contingencies; and possibly for a Bill in connection with the Private Bill Procedure in Scotland.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: When will the business be brought on to-morrow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As regards business for to-morrow, we must wait to see what the Volunteers Bill will take. I am afraid I cannot give any precise indication of the business for next week, except that the India Bill will be taken on Thursday of the week next. It will, perhaps, be convenient that on Thursday next and for the remainder of the session public business will begin at a quarter past three of half-past three of the clock.

extend some indulgence to me, as I may have some little difficulty in making myself properly heard. Fair progress has been made since I last addressed the Committee in shipbuilding and in the delivery of armour and machinery. I cannot say that these deliveries are still up to our expectations and our hopes. There is, however, a great deal of improvement since last year in that respect. Armour has distinctly been delivered in larger quantities. Nevertheless, both as regards armour and the various materials that are necessary for shipbuilding, there is still a certain difficulty in getting all that is required in sufficient time. Many comments have been made on my statement with reference to the reasons why it was inadvisable to lay down more ships. I have a distinct policy in that respect. I should be extremely sorry if the laying down of more ships retarded the completion and the delivery of those that are already in hand. I should consider it undesirable to lay down a showy programme with a number of armoured ships and a number of cruisers with the necessary machinery, if by that I impaired to a certain extent the rapid completion of those that are now in hand. I am not sure that the Admiralty did not go rather too far before in laying down more ships at the time than those with which rapid progress could be made; and I wish the Committee thoroughly to grasp this—that it is not only the shipbuilder, it is not only the men in the dockyards who have to work to complete the ship, but we have to put the tube manufacturers into action, the manufacturers of gun mountings, of hydraulic machinery, and of a thousand accessories, and unless the deliveries of these accessories proceed pari passu with the completion of the hulls of the ships there is great waste. Scarcely in any single one of these respects have the contractors been able to keep their time. The House knows the many circumstances which affect in this way the completion of our ships. Shipbuilders do not make their own tubes, and contracts to deliver tubes have to be let to various contractors; nor do they make their own hydraulic machinery. If they are dependent on sub-contractors, then, if these sub-contractors were at once to assist the new ships, it would be at the expense of the delivery of the ships now in hand. For instance, if there were more armoured ships laid down, it would be more difficult to get the armour which we now want for our ships; and we want armour for our ships in every direction. The public will scarcely realise the enormous number of ships that are building now for Her Majesty Government. Our programme is extremely large—larger than it has ever been at any time before. I am anxious that we should go on with that programme, laying down other ships so soon as we see that we have got a good prospect of making progress with them. Some firms have stated that they are willing to build ships at once, and we shall lay down new ships as soon as we see a prospect of making progress with them. Well, we have got to place six armoured cruisers under contract, and I am glad there will be such good competition for them as I gather from some of the statements currently made. Again, as regards the manufacture of machinery, it will be necessary to make machinery not only for these six armoured cruisers, but also for the two new battleships included in the programme. The Committee have observed from the Supplementary Estimate that where we have had the opportunity of purchasing some ships that were near completion we have availed ourselves of the option. In the Supplementary Estimate we take money to complete the purchase of five torpedo boat destroyers, which are almost ready, and which lay outside the programme that I submitted to the House. One of these is a very interesting vessel, a sister ship to the "Viper," embodying the turbine principle, which, so far as we are able at present to see, has been very successful. There will be further trials, but already speeds of thirty-six and thirty-four knots have been obtained. We have every hope that this new system of propelling will turn out a success. That is another argument for not having done what we are reproached in some quarters for not having done—namely, for not having laid down a number of new torpedo-boat destroyers. We want to see how this new system, which is especially adapted to torpedo-boat destroyers, will answer before we commence. We have every reason to suppose that in this new and most ingenious invention we shall find a fresh power which we shall have secured for this country, and in which for once, I think, this country will have a start over all other countries. I really do not know whether I ought to detain the House on a subject which has given rise to some questions and answers across the Table of the House and to some controversy in the newspapers. The controversy in the newspapers is a very one-sided controversy, because while the administration is attacked day by day he very seldom has the opportunity to reply. I have not been charged—a charge which I thought I had entirely disposed of—with having neglected to spend all the money which has been placed at the disposal of the Admiralty by the House, and it is treated almost as a matter of trust. All the money in the dockyards has been spent in all the years. We have not been behindhand with our construction in the dockyards. It has been through the contracts under Vote 3, that we have fallen behind. We cannot spend the money if the contractors do not produce the ships or armour or the machinery for which we have to pay them. But if there is anybody who must regret this delay, it is the Board of Admiralty, who are disappointed in their programme and have to show what they hoped to be able to produce, but not produced. The chief regret is that we are powerless to help or to prevent it if the contractors do not earn the money. It must, however, be good in subsequent years. Even when the Estimates are being made, if we have not spent the money for our disposal on shipbuilding, we add the sum to the Estimates for the following year, so far as we knew the expenditure of the following year. We take the first year for instance. A sum unexpended in that year £1,000,000 was re-voted in the following year, and the balance fell upon later years; if you once fall behindhand the payments must be spread over a number of years. All I can assure the House that, in making the Estimates, we have invariably added what was short-spent in one year to the Estimates of the coming year, and then taken a survey of the whole. Hon. Members can test that for themselves. If they take the "Canopus," or the "Ocean," or the later ships, they will find that the estimated expenditure placed against the ship in the three years or the four years is much larger than the total cost of the ship—that is to say, a part of the cost is re-voted. It has not been our fault that we have not been able to spend the cannot reiterate in too strong terms we have always revoted the money spread it over later years when we proved that the amount of money would be spent. I must apologise to the Committee for having gone into this matter. Some people might think it was wrong for me to argue with sandwichmen, but there are so many ways in which money has been spread by placards and leaflets all over the country that I have been advised that it would be wise for me to contradict it once more—I hope for all. There is another and still more absurd charge—namely, that the Admiralty have, out of deference to the Treasury, endeavoured to induce contractors to slacken the speed with which they were building their ships, and putting the necessity for paying the instalments. I always wonder where such suggestions can be hatched. I cannot imagine what can possibly be the ground for them. I am told it was suggested that I still retained some of my Chancellor of the Exchequer instincts, and that I was anxious to do a good turn to my right-hand friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer by allowing him to have more money to pay off debt rather than spending it upon ships for which I am responsible. I need scarcely assure the House that it is too puerile, too absurd, to make such a suggestion as this. Far from it, in some cases we have given advances to contractors who were not yet entitled to them, to help them over some difficulty in order to be sure that we should not check the building of ships for whose delivery we are so anxious. I do not think there is a single person, in this House at all events, who would believe that any Admiralty would, in deference to any Department of the State, induce contractors to slacken the speed with which they can build ships. Certainly no such suggestion has ever been made to me while I have been at the head of the Admiralty. I have said enough now on the general progress which has been made with our shipbuilding, and I hope I do not take at all a pessimistic view. I believe that from month to month we shall now get on better, and that we shall find the deliveries on which we count coming in more punctually with every quarter. It will be a great satisfaction to me if, at the end of this year, I shall be able to show that we have spent, as I hope we shall spend, every shilling the House has placed at our disposal. The House may wish to know what type of battleships are to be the two which are to be laid down in the dockyards. They are to be of the “Formidable” and not of the “Canopus” type. Then, the new “Hermes” will be about a knot faster than the former “Hermes.” I do not think the House will think it necessary that I should say anything about the smaller ships. They are of the same character as their predecessors. With reference to one very important question connected with shipbuilding, I will refer in one sentence to the experiments of the “Belleisle” and the question of the amount of wood which is to be put into our ships. Now, so far as the experiments on the “Belleisle” could prove that proper arrangements for flooding the decks and for taking every precaution against fire will have great success, so far I think the experiment has been distinctly successful. Attention is always called to the Spanish and Chinese ships, but on the Chinese and Spanish ships we have no evidence whatever that they had these fire services and all these precautions which are taken on board British men-of-war. In the case of the “Belleisle” the pumps continued to flood the deck during the whole of the bombardment, and were found to be quietly wetting the deck after a certain part of the ship had been destroyed. But I frankly say that I wish to guard the Admiralty against the impression that, because this experiment shows what it has shown, therefore we should be at all remiss in diminishing as far as we possibly can the employment of wood in all our battleships. What our critics do not quite realise is this: that, if there is to be a general reform carried out and that reform is carried out at once, it would involve taking an undue number of ships to pieces at possibly a very unfavourable and critical moment. When we are asked to reconstruct ships, what does it mean? It means that at a given time those ships must be put out of action for six months or a year, or for even a longer period. Therefore it has to be done with judgment, and we must watch the political situation of the day, lest we should be found improving ships just when ships are required, and instead of being ready at a critical moment we should find ourselves with ships stripped, and unable to be put into line.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) asked a question with regard to the use of non-inflammable wood.

MR. GOSCHEN: Non-inflammable wood is a different part of the question. We are putting non-inflammable wood into some of the ships we are building now, but the use of non-inflammable wood has not been entirely satisfactory, not as regards its non-inflammability, but as regards some of its other properties which make it rather difficult to employ it in certain parts of the ships. Great attention is being paid to the matter, but it must not be thought that the question can be solved by employing this particular wood without considerable further experience and experiment.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): Is it not true that the difficulty mostly experienced is with regard to painting?

MR. GOSCHEN: That is one difficulty; there are other defects. There are certain qualities in non-inflammable wood which, when it is brought into contact with screws and other ironwork which are required in fastening the wood, lead to corrosion. But this is not so simple a question as it may at first sight appear. Now I approach a topic which attracts a great deal of interest, one which is very technical indeed, and one with regard to which I should like to give some explanation and information to the House—namely, the very controverted question of water-tube boilers. Now, the experts in this House and those who are initiated in the matter will excuse me if on some points I seem to explain facts that are known to experts, but which may not be so well understood by the uninitiated. In the first instance, a great distinction is to be drawn between two classes of water-tube boilers—the small water-tube boilers and the large water-tube boilers. The large water-tube boiler is generally represented by the Belleville and Niclausse and some other types. The small water-tube boiler is represented by the Thornycroft, the Normand, the Yarrow, and others. These two classes resemble each other in some respects, and especially in this, that they are both applied to high pressure—very high pressure—in all the ships of the class of water-tube boilers. There is also a certain approximation between water-tube boilers and large tube boilers. A water-tube boiler, I say to those who are not cognizant of the subject, is a boiler where the water is in the tubes and the fire is outside of the tubes, while with the cylindrical boiler the fire is in the tubes and the water is around. The water-tube boiler has this advantage, that they require only one-tenth of the water which is required in the cylindrical boiler, and, if there were no other considerations, there would be a gain in lightness in favour of the water-tube boiler as against the cylindrical boiler, which requires so much water. I only make that observation the way. I now return to water-tube boilers generally. The small water-tube boiler was introduced, I think, as long ago as 1885, and it has been applied to the destroyers and the torpedo boats, and I doubt whether we could not have torpedo boat destroyers of the type which we have them, with a speed of thirty knots, without the help of tube boilers. But the attack made upon the small water-tube boiler I think they are accepted with merits and demerits, because, of course, as they have merits, so, too, they have demerits. We have now gone through three or four stages with regard to the machinery, and I may point out some historical interest, that precisely the same outcry which is being raised against water-tube boilers was raised against triple-expansion machinery in 1892. There was a great prejudice that form of boiler in the Navy, which was ultimately overcome.

SIR FORTESCUE FLAHERTY (Yorkshire, Shipley): But there is a breakdown at sea.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am coming to the breakdown at sea, if the Committee have patience. I will try to lay the ground, but I want the Committee to realise what it means—and perhaps some bearing on the breakdown—this greater steam pressure. In battleships and cruisers the steam pressure of the engines was 95 lb. In the pressure was 135 lb., and in battleships we have gone up to 300 lb. in the boilers and 250 lb. at the pistons. That is to say that since 1885 the pressure has risen from 90 lb. to 250 lb. as required.

The Committee will see, even if you have this enormous steam pressure the machinery is constructed to stand that have to undergo a much fiercer may use the word, than they had in the old times.

LLAN (Gateshead): May I request, right hon. Gentleman that that pressure in the mercantile OSCHEN: I will come to the marine; I will endeavour to follow my hon. friend; but the very technical, and I hope members will permit me to proceed without interruption. The mercantile has to do totally different work. The mercantile marine have a programme to carry out. They do work which the men-of-war do not do, and the men-of-war have to do which the mercantile marine do not do. The mercantile marine have their engines without regard to the deck, below which they must be kept and above which they must be dangerous to keep them. Men must compress their machinery into space and weight as will enable them to carry armour and guns, and they use all this not only with reference to the construction of boilers, but reference to machinery which has the great pressure of 250 lb. at 185 and 300 lb. in the boilers. The genius of our engineers and the skill of our manufacturers by degrees, and by experience, sometimes by painful experience, show that they can create machinery and to the auxiliary appurtenances to the machinery to stand this test, and give lighter machinery—because the point—they will have made the efficient men-of-war, and will be enabled you to compete better with the foreign nations. That is the very answer which I give to my friend opposite. In torpedo boats the pressure was 130 lb. to 150 lb. In 1895 it was 225 lb. The members will see, therefore, that the pressure applied has risen, and it will be the result of a careful study of the subject that the main difficulties are not in the boilers. The main difficulties have been in the engines and in the auxiliary appliances of the ship, and the steam pipes especially, with their present enormous length. The difficulties have been to get a perfect system which will endure this high pressure. Then as regards revolutions. In 1885 the revolutions were seventy-five to eighty-five. Now, in 1900, they are 110. The greatest differences, of course, are in the smaller ships. The smaller cruisers had 110 revolutions, and they have now gone up to 185, the third-class cruisers to 250; in torpedo gunboats they have gone up to 370, and in torpedo boat destroyers to 380 and 400 revolutions. I ask the Committee to consider for a moment these figures, and to see what it means to have these 400 revolutions in a minute, as is done in the torpedo boat destroyers. There are defects continually, and no doubt sometimes those defects are made to reflect on the Belleville boilers. Now I must pass rapidly over the torpedo boat destroyers. The pace is so tremendous, the revolutions are so many, and the pressure is so high, that certain defects are expected. We take that into account in the number of destroyers that we order, and that we arrange for employment in time of war. We say, "We have 100 destroyers; and there will be a certain proportion of them in need of repair." But a torpedo-boat destroyer is always employed near a base; and we are now arranging to have repairing ships for all the groups of destroyers, able to carry out the repairs in case of small accidents to the machinery without having recourse to the dockyards themselves. The small water-tube boilers are always put into the destroyers and into some of the third-class cruisers. In France they have put the small water-tube boilers into some of their very large cruisers; but it is strongly held at the Admiralty—though experience may show this to be wrong—that the small tube boilers have a shorter life than the large tube boilers; and, therefore, where you can use the latter, it is wiser. Mr. Yarrow is hard at work on the whole subject, and it may ultimately be proved that these boilers have a longer life than we can at present assign to them; but, of course, the life of a boiler must be taken into consideration. As to the Belleville boilers, they were first introduced into the British Navy in the "Sharpshooter." They were tried there, and having been successful, the Admiralty of the day applied them to the "Powerful" and the "Terrible." The "Sharpshooter" is a vessel of about 730 tons, and the "Powerful" and "Terrible" are vessels of 14,000 tons. I well remember the argument used at that time, and it is a very interesting point in connection with water-tube boilers. The water-tube boilers are much smaller than the cylindrical boilers in this respect: that where, in a battleship, you have eight cylindrical boilers you have twenty water-tube boilers. The result is that, if anything goes wrong with one boiler, in the case of water-tube boilers only one-twentieth of the boiler-power is out of action; while in the case of the cylindrical boilers one-eighth is out of action. In the water-tube type you distribute the risks over a much wider area, and the accident is smaller in extent. There is this further advantage—that you can repair the water-tube much more easily than the cylindrical boiler. When you have a protected deck it is a very different thing repairing a water-tube boiler from lifting up your deck to get at a cylindrical boiler which represents one-eighth of the whole boiler power. It may fairly be admitted, even by the opponents of the water-tube boilers, that that is one of their advantages. They are easier of access and easier of repair, and the risks are distributed over a larger area. The defects of the water-tube boilers are alleged by their opponents to be that they are less reliable and more exposed to develop defects. The question is, Are these defects inherent or are they remediable? It must be acknowledged that there are defects, though they have been exaggerated. If they are irremediable, then we must abandon the water-tube boilers. But if they are remediable, and if experience shows month by month that you can deal with them; and if other experience shows that frequently these defects have been overcome; then it would be folly to sacrifice the clear advantages of the water-tube boilers because you have given up too soon the task of remedying temporary and not inherent defects, due to inexperience. That is a fair statement of the issue between the two sides. Our position is that the defects are remediable; that they have been in part remedied, and are being further remedied, and we must attempt to secure the advantages of water-tube boilers by endeavouring to meet the defects as they arise. I go back for one moment to the question of the "Sharpshooter" and the "Powerful." The "Powerful" had forty boilers, and the "Sharpshooter" had eight. I will not say that the boilers of the "Powerful" were absolutely a tithe of those in the "Sharpshooter," but they were only one-third larger; and therefore, if you had seen the working of the boilers in the "Sharpshooter" you could form a very good opinion of the working of the "Powerful's" forty boilers. There was one element at that time, perhaps, which was not sufficiently considered in the very great stride which had been made; and that is an element which is facing us continually in all this difficult question—namely, the human element. The supervision of forty boilers is a much greater task than the supervision of eight boilers, even after you have multiplied the number of engineers in proportion. The advance was rapid; and I think it will be found that the defects are not inherent in the "Powerful" and subsequent ships. But there has been difficulty in the insufficient early training of engineers, stokers, and engine-room officers in their new and more complicated occupations. Perhaps the advance made was too rapid; but we must choose between that and the sacrifice of the additional speed and additional power which the water-tube boiler gave while it was pretty certain that the genius of English engineers and the source of English stokers the intricacies of training would be overcome. We believe that it is being, and we know that it has been to a large extent elsewhere. The "Powerful" and "Terrible" were completed, and the "Powerful" was put into commission. Some hon. Members and a portion of the press are accustomed to speak of the "Powerful" as "the lame duck," and are afraid that it is the same with a woman—once damaged by a single accident and she will never recover. The "Powerful's" reputation has been damaged not by any accident to her boilers, not by anything really connected with her water-tube boilers, but by a breakdown at Malacca and Colombo, due to the heating of the main engines and to some defects in the auxiliary machinery. When she returned from Colombo her officers declared that regret was that "some inconsequent in the House of Commons" had de- the accident to be due to the water-boilers. When the "Powerful" arrived at Hong Kong there were remarkable descriptions of her sent home. She had been the finest ship and the fastest ship, and she had done the fastest on the China Station of any vessel in the service. The "Powerful" on the China Station did extremely well. One of the great drawbacks which has to be put with is the high coal consumption. She had no economisers. But apart from that she did admirably. From Hong Kong to Manila she steamed for four days at 20·3 knots, and for twenty-four hours at nearly 20 knots; and no cylindrical boiler ship has ever done such a run on commission. From Hong Kong to Yokohama she steamed for four hours more than 20 knots; and in the Channel and the Atlantic, for sixty hours, three-fifths of her power, 15,000-horse power, she steamed at 19·6 knots. A ship that can do 19·6 knots with three-fifths of her power, is a very good ship, and need not be called a "lame duck." The defects stated at the time of these trials were small defects. It is unfair to expect water-tube boilers to perform feats which they were never asked to perform. I do not know whether I ought to speak at such length, but I have felt the importance of this question as being one of the greatest responsibility to the First Lord. These are some of the advantages claimed for the water-tube boiler—greater speed, greater power of getting up speed quickly, lighter weight, and smaller space. This last point is disputed, but there is claimed for them generally greater speed on smaller dimensions, which allows of more guns or heavier guns. These advantages are scarcely denied to the water-tube boilers except by extreme opponents, but it is argued that these boilers are exposed to defects to which the others are not exposed. That is the general charge that is brought against them. If anyone has studied the Paper circulated or the accidents which have taken place they will have seen the many directions in which these defects have occurred, and that in comparative proportion those which have occurred in the boilers as compared with those in the engines and in the steam pipes connected with the engines are very few. I call attention to the last table in the Memorandum circulated, where it is shown that only thirty-eight tubes out of the thousands enumerated there have burst since the accident in the "Terrible." Side by side with this increased pressure to which I have referred, side by side with this more complicated arrangement, there has been an enormous, in some respects a regrettable but unavoidable, increase in all the auxiliary machinery of ships. There are auxiliary engines for the working of the capstan, motors, electric light, and refrigerators. All these engines are put in different parts of the ship connected with steam pipes all along, and with this enormous length of steam piping you have a high pressure operating on the joints of those pipes; and the difficulty arises as much from the multiplication of the machinery as from any principle affecting the boiler, and it is in that direction you must endeavour to find some solution. But the defects are not, as we believe, important defects. There has been one important breakdown enumerated in the Memorandum, the "Hermes." Apart from that, the class of breakdowns generally are with reference to some of the minor arrangements of the ship. All these are brought forward, but what is not brought forward are the successful runs of the ship. We have got a certain number of ships in commission, among them the "Andromeda," the "Niobe," and the "Diadem." All these ships are doing most excellent work. Then you have the "Arrogant" and the "Furious"; they have made excellent runs. There is one ship which has been a disappointment, the "Europa." A curious thing is this, that the "Europa" is a sister ship to the "Andromeda," the "Niobe," and the "Diadem." That the "Europa" is not doing well proves that there must be something in her arrangements not yet discovered, but it is not in the system of boilers, if it were you would find the same defects in the other ships; it is in the management of leaks in unsuspected places or defects of that kind where the disappointment must have taken place. It is very much the same with the "Hermes" and the "Highflyer." All these things require most careful examination, and that examination is continually going on. I claim that we have never tried to hide our difficulties in the least. We have never curtailed the experiments we have made. We have increased the trials of our ships in every way, and we have made special trials. We are not thinking of damaging our case; we are seeking to get to the bottom of the question of water-tube boilers and testing them in every possible way. The personnel of the Fleet has increased at a large rate that it has been impossible to give that full training to the younger men we should like. There are a number of engineers and stokers who have not had experience on water-tube boiler ships, but we are not going to shrink from putting water-tube boilers into commission, not only with the object of seeing whether they have those defects, but also in order to accustom as many engineers and stokers as possible to the use of those boilers, of which we have so many in the Navy. I have quoted the case of the "Powerful." Here are some special trials of the Belleville boilers. The "Diadem," from Gibraltar to the Nore in 1898, ran 1,330 miles at a speed of 19·27 knots. That is an extremely good run. The "Andromeda," from Gibraltar to Malta, 891 miles, attained a speed of 19·1 knots, using four-fifths of her power only. On a recent occasion the Mediterranean Squadron steamed a distance of 800 miles, from Gibraltar to Aranci Bay. The "Ocean," with the water-tube boilers, steamed 790 miles at four-fifths n.d. power, at 16·9 knots, and beat the "Renown," the next fastest of the ships in the Mediterranean Squadron, by one knot, and other battleships by from 1·9 to 2·79 knots. The "Ocean," with the water-tube boilers, is the fastest ship on the Mediterranean station. I should like to clear up one point which is continually raised by hon. Members. I revert again to the question of defects. Are they remediable or irremediable? What is the experience of other countries? I am told that there are hon. Members who have given an indirect warning by conveying that if there is one argument to which they would not listen with patience it would be that the British Navy could learn anything from foreign navies, or that their experience would be in any way a guide to the experience of this country. There are other hon. Members who think, and I have seen it stated in the press within the last few days, that we were going to introduce a fad of the French Navy. I remind those who are so chary of allowing us to look into the doings of other countries, some of which, like the French and the United States, have a very great reputation for engineering, that in the case of the breechloader and the muzzleloader the same kind of language was used with regard to the introduction of French fashions. I remember the struggle there was in order to introduce the breechloader into the Navy. What is the result? The French got the start of us, and they have kept it. Again, as to ironclads, the French were the first to put on armour. Thus I sweep away the idea that we can learn nothing from other countries. It is a dangerous theory, and it betrays a wrong insular pride and insular danger. How do we stand in France? They introduced some time ago, and while we were experimenting carefully, the water-tube boilers into their battleships. In the whole of the fine Mediterranean squadron, and the northern squadron, their combined squadron, I do not think there is a ship in that fleet which has cylindrical boilers. How do we know that? The answer? They have been seen. So these ships have been seen for six years. It is our business at the Admiralty to know what the French ships are, as it is the business of the French Admiralty to know what we are. We know the degree with which they are satisfied with their boilers, and the test: they are re-boiling all the ships that had cylindrical boilers; as they can prepare them, they are putting in water-tube boilers. Because they find the water-tube boiler has been a success and answers the purpose for which they designed it; they think they have overcome the defects which are due to the trial being sufficient, and because they think the advantages to be gained are great that they are bound to do so much for the promise. I find that the House will see that we shall be wrong if we brushed away the facts. The French First Lord of the Admiralty claims that their Mediterranean fleet is a knot faster than ours; cannot deny that the French ships are somewhat faster than ours; but that with the "Ocean" and her ships we shall more than make good our lee-way. I say we are bound to take into consideration the fact that the United States, Russia, Japan, all those countries which are now developing their na-are without hesitation adopting boilers. They have not only example, but the criticisms against the defects and the merits of those boilers—they have that, yet, nevertheless, they are ward with water-tube boilers, every ship in the United States having water-tube boilers put mercantile marine. It must be remem-bered that the mercantile marine steamers have perfectly different functions to perform to those of the Royal Navy. The former go from one port to another continuously steaming the whole time, whether at the maximum or it may be with something in hand, I am not prepared to say; but, at all events, their object is to go as fast as possible from one place to another. Their success depends upon their speed, and the coal consumption and other considerations of that kind are absent from their mind.

MR. ALLAN: No.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am afraid I have not expressed myself accurately; but, at all events, what they have got to arrive at is that they shall have the reputation of being the fastest steamer from port to port. Their length does not much matter; they know exactly the docks to which they go and the docks to which they will go back; and, as a parenthesis, let me say that after every voyage they have their machinery examined and little repairs put to rights before they start on their next voyage. Men-of-war, on the other hand, are away sometimes for a year, and their artificers must do the best they can to make good such defects as occur in all steamships. It seems to be supposed in some quarters that the one thing for a man-of-war is to try and get an extra knot at full speed. Here is a curious fact. It will startle hon. Members to know that the difference in speed of the "Powerful" between 18,000 horse-power and 25,000 horse-power is 1·2 of a knot, or say 1½ knots. To put on extra pressure to the extent of 7,000 horse-power for the sake of one extra knot and a quarter, when you are cruising from one port to another without any particular purpose, would surely not be common sense, and our Admirals do not do it, except, it may be, for purposes of experiment. I will show the conditions under which Her Majesty's Navy generally cruise. According to the Queen's Regulations the following is the classification of the speeds to be used on different occasions with natural draught—

"With all despatch, four-fifths power; with despatch, three-fifths power; with ordinary despatch, two-fifths power; and for ordinary steaming, one-fifth power. Air pressure and four-fifths power are only to be used in cases of great urgency."

When hon. Members talk of the "Powerful" "crawling home," her commander is, in fact, simply obeying the Queen's Regulations. I might dilate on the subject of the mercantile marine not adopting water-tube boilers; but I prefer not to do so, for I am afraid I have already almost exhausted the patience of the House—[HON. MEMBERS: No, no.]—I know that whatever I say to-night will not have the effect of allaying the public uneasiness. Partly on account of breaks-down, due to numerous small defects, the smallness of which cannot be appreciated by people generally, but defects which hon. Members by eloquent speeches know how to magnify, a feeling of uneasiness has been created in the public mind. I recognise that the House and the country have with unstinted liberality given the Admiralty all they have asked for in money, and besides that, they have given that which has been valuable to us—namely, their confidence generally. I recognise that with frankness; and seeing that the country has done this, and seeing that from many quarters not hostile to water-tube boilers, but friendly and sympathetic quarters, it has been urged upon me that the country would like to have what they call an impartial verdict on the water-tube boiler, I will consent to an inquiry by a Committee into the subject. I consent to it with some reluctance, and I will tell the Committee why. It disturbs a Department terribly when in the full pressure of their business, with the vast amount of work connected with the Navy to do, with so many ships in commission and under construction, with all the new inventions and appliances, new gun-mountings, new hydraulic arrangements, new electric arrangements, being forced upon them from day to day, which must be examined and which cannot be left entirely to subordinates, but which must pass under the review of those who are responsible to the Board of Admiralty and the country generally—it is, I say, a terrible thing when for a long period they have their time occupied with a Committee sitting at the Admiralty, looking up the whole facts and making good their defence. It would be only human if a great portion of their energy and power were absorbed and hampered by the sitting of such a Committee. I have thought over that and how it could be avoided. I do not know that I can succeed in avoiding it entirely, but what we want is a practical examination of the water-tube boiler in actual operation. I believe, for my own part, the House and this House of Commons will be satisfied if they had actually seen a water-tube boiler in operation than that would be from the Reports of a Committee, which necessarily in a Committee of this kind must go largely into little details. It is entirely a question of petty details, and I wish to give the Committee some means of satisfying themselves as to the efficiency of the boilers and the details of defects which occur and the means applied to remedy them. What I think would best meet the case would be a Committee on which practical and going engineers—outside engineers—should be largely represented. It should be part of their functions actually to go to sea in some water-tube boiler and examine the question on board both on trial runs and under service conditions. The Committee should also examine some ships in reserve in dockyard, study the scientific or theoretical as well as the practical side of the question. The "Europa" is one of the ships I will place at the disposal of the Committee for investigation. She has these defects, and I should be prepared that they should investigate the system of the ship and tell us what is wrong with that ship, as against her sister ship, which has none of these defects. They should also see the "Hyacinth." They can see the "shooter," with the Belleisle boiler, the "Sheldrake," with the Babcock & Wilcox, and the "Seagull," with the Niclausse boilers—three ships which I propose to use for extra naval purposes and for the training of stokers. They can also see the two ships in commission with the Channel Squadron, the "Diadem" and the "Pelorus." It will be recognised that a Committee of all of whose members, of course, cannot be prepared to undertake that kind of work, but a Committee on which would sit who would have this practical experience, would be a means by which the House and the country might satisfy themselves either of the efficiency of the boilers or of the remediable or irreparable character of the defects. hon. Members will consent to the appointment of a Committee, which will have the same opportunity as other Committees have of calling witnesses on point in the investigation of the which I have made a proposal commend itself to those who a practical examination of this subject.

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Burghs): I rise at once to say that I am sure is the general opinion of hon. Members—a feeling of satisfaction towards the right hon. Member on the decision at which he has arrived. The announcement which he has made, that the Admiralty, while waiting for their opinion on the main question, so far as their experience has been, while maintaining that there is no rashness or want of administrative willingness and anxious that the country should be satisfied on the point, and that an inquiry of the kind which he has indicated should be made, I think, give great satisfaction to hon. Members. The mind of the country has been greatly exercised on the subject. I believe that the Government's decision whatever on either one side or the other, and for which I have been anxious for very long, is in connection with naval matters not to lend myself to anything which would bring either of the services into the sphere of mutual and partisan recrimination. I can commend the right hon. Member, the First Lord of the Admiralty, for having pursued that policy as occupied his present position. It has always been the practice of the Admiralty; there has been no disposition to make out what we, the existing Board, are, poor creatures those were who were before. I have never seen any other spirit in the right hon. Member. Therefore, it is only carry on the spirit which he has introduced into these debates to say that nothing in this matter which is in the direction of party recrimination. Nor is any censure or disapproval involved of the conduct of the Admiralty itself. I trust the right hon. Member and his colleagues at the Admiralty will understand that if I stand up here and say it is a relief to me to be an inquiry, it is to me we have any doubt of the wisdom—so far as mortals are concerned—with certainty of their wisdom, the right hon. Gentleman and the Board, but that we feel that it is most desirable that there should not be this uneasy feeling in the country. Sometimes it is almost as harmful that there should be a suspicion of there being something wrong as that there should be something wrong. It is of great importance, when the country is so anxious to support the Department in this great matter of national defence, that the Department should do everything in their power to secure the real confidence of the country. Here is a new departure which is taking place in the propelling machinery of the ships of the Navy. Tremendous experiments are taking place; no doubt some will say it has placed a large portion of our fleet in a very unsatisfactory condition, whilst others would say that if we do not adopt this new system we shall be behind the world in efficiency; but in whichever of these views the truth lies, or whether it lies between them, it is most desirable that we should know from outside, impartial, and expert testimony how the matter stands. I am certain that there will be in the country, as there is within this House to-night, a feeling of intense satisfaction and relief that the right hon. Gentleman, with great public spirit, not minding the appearance of any little triumph for himself, nor caring whether his reputation as a Minister is enhanced or not by the result, is desirous of doing what is right by making inquiry into the matter in this impartial way. By that I believe he will have done much, not only to improve in the end the condition of the Navy, but to improve and strengthen the confidence possessed by the country in the Board of Admiralty and in the Navy itself.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: The House always welcomes invitations of this kind from the right hon. Gentleman, and it welcomes the candour with which he has dealt with this question of the water-tube boilers. This question of water-tube boilers has been dealt with by successive Admiralty administrations. It first originated in a practical form in the administration of which the right hon. Member for Clitheroe was the Secretary, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean the Civil Lord, and that being so, I should like to emphasise in the strongest manner the statement thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that there is no party feeling in this matter. We have listened with rapt attention for one hour and a half to a most lucid statement from the First Lord of the Admiralty, but the Committee must have been reminded whilst listening to his speech of two modern phrases—"the old Parliamentary hand," and the Chinese observation, "Saving one's face."

From one end to the other of the right hon. Gentleman's speech he attempted, and successfully, to save the face of the Admiralty in regard to much; but there is one part of his speech in which I venture to think he has not made good all that he has claimed for the Admiralty or himself. I refer to the spending of money that has been voted by this House from time to time for ships. The right hon. Gentleman said when introducing the Naval Estimates early in the session that there had been a failure on the part of contractors to earn instalments that would otherwise have been due to them. The right hon. Gentleman said in the early part of the session that the intention was to spend that money still, if contractors were found who were willing to undertake the duty of constructing the vessels; but the armour, hulls, and propelling machinery could not be obtained within reasonable time for delivery from the manufacturers, so that the Administration were restricted in the proposal that they made to the House. Now, what happened after that was that, in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, certain large firms of the highest possible standing publicly offered to assist in making up the arrears of naval construction. One of these firms was Armstrong, Whitworth, and Co.

MR. GOSCHEN: That firm does not produce its own armour, and can only get it from those firms which are not able to produce sufficient to meet the present requirements of the Admiralty.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: Can it be said that ships cannot be produced when such a firm as Armstrong, Whitworth, and Company have no Admiralty contract at the present time?

MR. GOSCHEN: Oh, yes; they have.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: Yes, they have some contracts, but they have no contracts for ships.

MR. GOSCHEN: I wish they had.

Sir Fortescue Flannery

MR. FORTESCUE FLANNERY: I wish they had too. If the firm of Armstrong, Whitworth, and Company have no contracts from the Admiralty, the Government ought not to be behind hand in getting delivery of

MR. GOSCHEN: I beg my hon. friend pardon. How can they get materials for the construction of ships unless they get them from the firms who are under contract to us? I am very anxious that should be made clear, because no material has been said on the subject. They do not make their own materials, but if they were to undertake to build ships, a strong and wealthy firm, they might pay manufacturers higher prices than are paid by other shipbuilders. If they used the materials of other people it would be at the risk of delaying the delivery of ships built by other contractors.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: Surely my right friend is drawn out on the credulity of the House. He asks the House to believe that Armstrong, Whitworth and Company would undertake to give delivery of ships at a certain time without inquiring beforehand whence they get the materials to build those

MR. GOSCHEN: How would we carry it out? They could only do so by paying such handsome prices that would prevent sub-contractors filling their contracts to all other firms. There are only limited sources of

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: I say that it is incredible that a firm of such standing as Armstrong, Whitworth and Company have attained and kept up the position either that they know where to get materials or that they intended to outbid the contract of the Admiralty for the materials obtainable on the market. May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that there are such Admiralty overseers—men who are to attend every day in the workshop where the work is going on, and who might be able to absolutely prevent delivery as Armstrong, Whitworth, and Company would purchase from having previously ordered by the Admiralty. I do not think, with respect to the right hon. Gentleman's position, it is tenable. The ill-the picture which my right hon. friend is one that fails at its very inception. The illustration fails in this, that it is not one picture, but a picture this year and next year and the year after—that would be required. It is a picture of ships that are required, and not a picture of a ship. The facts are—and it is impossible to get away from them—that this year has voted money for the purpose of new construction of ships, and that, by the admission of my right hon. friend, no money has not been spent. Now, when a Supplementary Estimate is being introduced to the House, there is no suggestion of new ships as distinguished from small craft, and no attempt made to take advantage of the public offer of firms of importance to enter into contracts for vessels to make up the deficiency of the last year.

MR. GOSCHEN: These firms will have an opportunity of tendering for the six armoured cruisers that are to be put out to contract.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: Do I understand my right hon. friend to say that if vacancies still remain in the private yards, after these contracts have been taken up, the Admiralty will avail themselves of the opportunity to make up some of the arrears of naval construction?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, if I could be convinced that in regard to the armour it would not interfere with the fulfilment of present contracts.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: I believe that Members of the House generally are of opinion that these arrears of naval construction ought to be made up without any hesitation whatever. The necessity for naval construction has recently become more accentuated than ever. The German Parliament has passed a Bill for the increase of the Navy by a majority of two to one. Affairs in the far East are so far developing that one cannot tell what may be the ultimate necessity for naval preparations for this country. So long as the Admiralty give the assurance that the arrears and defects in connection with our administration in preparation for the Navy are not in any degree likely to be repeated, then I feel certain that the House will be satisfied.

There is some encouragement in the fact that the Admiralty have purchased six new torpedo boat destroyers. I believe the Admiralty have done most wisely in purchasing a vessel which has the enormously high speed of 36 knots—a vessel with an entirely new kind of machinery which engineers believe will develop into a great and enormous improvement on anything that has gone before it. I come now to the question on which my right hon. friend laid the greatest stress in the course of his speech—the question of the boilers in Her Majesty's fleet. If the Committee will bear with me I will very briefly remind them of the history of this question, and of the reason why boilers of the new type have been eagerly seized upon by the Admiralty. It is an axiom which any one can understand in the designing of a ship, that any saving of weight in the propelling machinery will have the effect of enabling either more coal to be carried for the purpose of propulsion, or the taking on board of heavier guns and a larger quantity of ammunition. On the other hand, if there is a saving of weight in the boilers, then machinery of larger power giving greater speed may be put into the vessel, and thicker armour may be employed. There had been, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, attempts made as early as 1885 to lighten the boilers, and thereby to improve the performances of war ships. First of all an attempt was made to use the locomotive boiler. That was an abject failure. The failure was recognised quickly, and that type of boiler as applied to naval purposes was quickly withdrawn. Then came the era of the water-tube boiler, and the course adopted by the Admiralty was one with which no one could find fault. It would be interesting to recall the composition of the Committee who some years ago recommended the adoption of the water-tube boiler in the first instance. There were the chief engineers of Lloyds, the Board of Trade, and the P. and O. Company—all of them men of scientific attainment and capable of dealing with this question in a practical as well as a scientific way. The Committee took evidence, and the members went to see what the new boiler might do. They reported in favour of a limited test of water-tube boilers in one vessel of small size; and the complaint that has been made in this House every year, when the Estimates have been discussed, is that there has been no proper test of the endurance of this new type of boiler, although ship after ship, time after time, has been fitted with these boilers. It is also complained that this change has been entirely carried out without any real attempt to test the endurance at a high speed for a long period. Considerable allusion has been made to the "Powerful." I ventured to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question recently as to the performances of the sister ship "Terrible" in carrying troops. There was some difference between my right hon. friend and myself upon the question of the length of the passage. I made it out from the newspaper reports to be five and a half or six days, but my right hon. friend made it five days. Assuming it to be five days for 1,800 miles, that vessel, carrying troops, in circumstances of the greatest national emergency, made a speed of fifteen miles an hour from Hong-Kong to Ta-ku. Can it be said that a vessel that appears in the Navy List as a twenty-two knot vessel was thus doing a performance which was satisfactory to the Admiralty, or which ought to be satisfactory to the country? Whilst our countrymen were immured in Peking to the imminent danger of their lives, the vessel carrying troops for their succour was not capable of going, or, at all events, did not go, at the highest speed which is claimed for her by the Admiralty. I do not know why we have not had some explanation of the passage—some accurate statement of the figures. If my figures are wrong, what are the correct figures? No doubt that is a matter that the new Committee will be able to deal with, but at present we are as much in the dark about it as when the question was first brought before the attention of the House. My right hon. friend has drawn a parallel between the Royal Navy and the mercantile marine. He has suggested that the difference between the boilers in Her Majesty's ships and the boilers of the mercantile marine is so complete that no fair comparison can be drawn. A fair comparison is this—that never, in all the trials which are set forth in the Memorandum issued to the House three days ago, was there a trial of endurance as regards length of passage with boilers of this type equal to what is ordinarily performed by vessels in the mercantile marine. We have in crossing the Atlantic every day one vessel or another at the highest speed of 20 knots, and that we have not any idea that the test of endurance is too prolonged. I challenge my right hon. friend to indicate in this Memorandum a single instance of a test of endurance as long as in the case of those merchant steamers crossing the Atlantic in the ordinary course of their duty. If such a test had been made and the results had proved that vessels with boilers of this type were capable of prolonged service at sea without breaking down, there would have been no necessity for this discussion. There is no necessity for the Memorandum which has been issued, and no necessity for the Committee which has at last been constituted to investigate this question. I feel that the acknowledgment should be made by the House to the right hon. Gentleman of this concession, which, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, is required to calm the uneasy feeling that undoubtedly exists throughout the country. But there is a claim in the Memorandum issued to the House which I feel certainly may be premature. The Admiralty has had the effrontery to state that a total of sixty-one ships—first, second, and third class cruisers—would, if fitted with cylindrical boilers, have had at least a knot less speed than they now will have on account of the water-tube boilers. May I refer to the question of the weight of boilers of this character? What is the advantage of saving weight if the consumption of coal is greater, and if the weight of the water and coal combined is greater in the new type than in the old? Some of the figures that are stated in the Memorandum are extremely interesting. A trial was made between the "Minerva" and the "Highflyer"—the "Highflyer" having water-tube boilers and the "Minerva" cylindrical boilers. The figures are not fully stated in the Memorandum, and if I have made any mistakes perhaps I may be corrected. In the first trial—

MR. GOSCHEN: Do you challenge the accuracy of the figures?

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: What I say is that the figures are not given fully. I am going to state the detailed figures of each particular run, and if the details I am giving are not accurate I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give correct figures. They are taken from an engineering newspaper, and I believe, correct. During the run of sixty hours at ten knots the "Minerva" consumed 27 per cent. less fuel than the "Highflyer" and at the end of the trial could not start for a voyage anywhere—to Italy or across the Atlantic. Immediately after the trial was concluded the "Highflyer," with water-tube boilers, was laid under repair. All the artificers from the other ships of the fleet were ordered to have been on board. There were two runs of sixty hours each at four knots. The "Minerva" had 380 tons of coal, and the "Highflyer" 463 tons. In, after these two trials, the "Highflyer" was under repair for six days, and the "Minerva," after this test of endurance, was capable of proceeding to anywhere she might besent. There were other runs of thirty hours, each ship at full power, and again the "Minerva" consumed much less coal than the "Highflyer." In these runs the "Highflyer" consumed 27 per cent. more than the other vessel. In, the "Highflyer" received heavy repairs, while the "Minerva" was ready to sea immediately after the trials were ended. If we find that on a run of sixty hours between these two sister ships the water-tube boilers consumed 100 tons of coal than the cylindrical boilers, the amount of weight claimed in the Memorandum as being saved by the adoption of water-tube boilers is really not saved, with such an enormous consumption of fuel you reduce the fighting power of the

Sir Fortescue Flannery.

I venture to say that such vessels like the "Hermes" are a danger and a trap for the engineers who man them. If I am excused for saying so, I regret much to notice that in a recent answer to a question the suggestion was made that the court-martial on the "Hermes" had found that as on account of the fault of the officers that such a misfortune should never happen in a ship as that which took place. The Admiralty say that the ship was helpless at mid-ocean, and had to be towed a long distance—1,600 or 1,800 miles—to a port of refuge. From the report it was found that the boilers were completely helpless. The suggestion was that the engineers had neglected to do their duty in the way of supplying these boilers with proper care and attention. I think it would be found that the facts are rather the reverse, and that the anxiety, overwork, and over-pressure arising from the necessary close attention to the delicate operations of these boilers actually drove the engineer into sickness and led to a mutiny amongst the stokers down below. British stokers will never hesitate to go into danger when it is necessary in the service of the country; but when a danger is gratuitously put upon them by having to attend boilers which are continually giving out and causing explosions at the most unexpected times, the result will be, as in the case of the "Hermes," that insubordination will arise, necessitating a lieutenant to go down into the stokehole to maintain that discipline which the engineers have no power to keep because they are not executive officers. These are some of the facts which have aroused uneasiness in the country. I do not propose to enlarge upon these matters, because the whole object of the motion for the reduction of this Vote which I had the honour to place on the Paper some time ago has now been attained. I do not believe that any of the hon. Gentlemen in this House who have been raising difficulties and doubts about these boilers desire anything more than an impartial inquiry and proper tests of their endurance. The criticism of hon. Members on both sides of the House has not been directed against any person at the Admiralty. They have been criticisms of a system. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Admiralty, in his remarkable speech this afternoon, has entered into all the details with great accuracy and in the most painstaking manner. This has occurred not on account of the want of engineering skill, but because of the system, and because of the inadequate staff which exists at the Admiralty to support Sir William White and Sir John Thurston. But when the Committee is appointed, let it not be in any degree a substitute for the necessary increase in the staff at the Admiralty. The Navy has been extended enormously in recent years, and the work that has been put upon the members of the scientific branch of the Admiralty has been out of proportion altogether to human endurance, or to what the Government has a right to expect from the men in that Department. I do not see that there is in this Supplementary Vote any suggestion of any increase in the Admiralty staff. That increase must come, whether in this or succeeding years, and we must have not merely an increase in the personnel of the scientific branch, but we must have an increase in the number of engineers afloat. When that increase is made and when the personnel of the Fleet is improved by an addition of a number of the best engineers, my right hon. friend will find that his difficulty about water-tube boilers will rapidly disappear. Before I sit down I would like to refer in a sentence to the argument based on the adoption of water-tube boilers by foreign navies. I do not think my right hon. friend has been fairly accused this afternoon of not being willing to profit by the example of foreign fleets. By all means let us obtain the information from wherever it is possible to obtain it. When it is suggested that any portion of our Fleet is in a parlous state it should be remembered that it is no answer to say that foreign navies with whom we have to fight are in an equally parlous state. That is no argument at all. We must have the very best that can be obtained, both in men and material. I believe the course which the right hon. Gentleman has taken will give general satisfaction, and will increase largely the confidence of the country in the administration which he guides so patiently and so successfully.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: The hon. Member who has just sat down was allowed by you, Mr. Lowther, to touch very briefly a point which was touched upon by the First Lord of the Admiralty, and which appears to me to have a most essential bearing upon the question of water-tube boilers, which has been submitted to the House. Upon that question I do not feel myself competent to offer an opinion, for it is a highly technical subject, but having read nearly everything which is sufficiently non-technical which has been written upon this subject, I am convinced that what the First Lord of the Admiralty called the human element plays a very large part indeed in connection with it. While hitherto I have hesitated to accept the view upon this question of the hon. Member for Gateshead, I am convinced that he has proved the other side of the case, which we are not in order in discussing now, namely, that the human element plays an enormous part in the matter, and that you are not dealing out fair treatment to any of your boilers unless you increase the number and efficiency of the men in your engine-room and strengthen your engineering department. There was observation in the First Lord's speech to which I should like to say a word. The right hon. Gentleman dealt with experiments which had been made with non-combustible wood. He stated that we had no evidence that during the destruction by fire of the Spanish and Chinese ships the decks had been flooded with water. That was contrary to the official information which had been given in the United States. The American reports which I have seen upon this subject do state that a fire occurred both on the Chinese and their own war ships in which the decks were flooded, and I think it is necessary to diminish the amount of wood to an extent to which we have not yet aimed. That is all I wish to say upon this subject. I will turn for a few minutes to what I consider seems to me to be the most important portion of the speech to which the hon. Member has listened with so much interest, and that is what the right hon. Gentleman has told us about his programme, which really constitutes his revised programme, for the present year. The state of things which was alluded to just now by the hon. Member for the Shipley Division is one in which I associate myself with the general views expressed by my hon. friend without adopting particular arithmetic. The importance of the subject is as great as any question that can possibly be brought before the Committee or before this House. The Prime Minister has made a statement to the position of the country, and he recommended the country to adopt a rapid and extraordinary means of defence establishing rifle clubs. I think the danger is entirely covered by a programme in regard to the British Fleet. The vast majority of the people of this country deny the possibility of dealing with the dangers which the Prime Minister has pointed out as the national fate of a maritime power—and which he described as "a blow directed against the heart"—by means of rifle clubs. I believe in naval means of meeting dangers; and the programme of the First Lord of the Admiralty has been criticised as being an insufficient programme in face of the dangers. The Prime Minister says what all of us feel, that at some period a coalition owers may be formed against us. He have exaggerated the danger, but I point out that at the beginning of session the First Lord of the Admiralty was criticised for the manner in which he has allowed his performances by year to fall below his programme. The reasons given in February last by the hon. Gentleman for the performance falling short of his programme were deficiencies in propelling machinery and armour. I think we ought to keep before our eyes the reason which is given this House for falling short in the programme which was considered absolutely necessary for the safety of the country. Earlier in the session the First Lord of the Admiralty replied to the hon. Member for Chester; dealing with those questions to-night, he spoke of them as an absurd charge against the Admiralty that their arrears from year to year should be added together. We know what the point is. Year by year we have been told that the sum of money asked for is the least that the Admiralty can safely do with, and yet we have always fallen short in that expenditure, and we have continued to fall short year by year. In the year 1898 there was a very great arrear, and in March, 1899, alluding to that arrear, the First Lord of the Admiralty said that—

“The programme is the lowest which can be justified by the existing expenditure on shipbuilding of other Powers.”

It is a serious thing, however you put it, arithmetic or no arithmetic, when admittedly we cannot complete a programme which is described in language of that kind. That is an admitted and acknowledged fact, and the reasons given for this falling short are difficulties with regard to the contractors. The right hon. Gentleman gave the same reason in February last, and he used the same phrase as last year. This year we have got into arrear again, and the reason given is that there have been deficiencies in the supply of armour and propelling machinery. To-night the First Lord of the Admiralty has said that we cannot spend the money if the contractors do not earn it, and the “contractors cannot do more.” That is practically a statement to this Committee to the effect that the resources of this country are insufficient to supply the armour and the propelling machinery which are considered to be necessary by the Admiralty for the safety of the country, and that is an admission which, as a supporter of the general policy of the right hon. Gentleman, I confess I am not able to accept. The First Lord of the Admiralty has stated that all this expenditure is necessary for the safety of the country, and the Prime Minister has put the danger to the country even higher than it has ever been put by an Opposition speaker, and yet in that year we fall short in our expenditure upon the Navy. We have been told that for the first time we are likely to come up to our promises this year in regard to our performances. In the meantime there has been a controversy between the hon. Member for Shipley and the First Lord of the Admiralty as to the possibility of adding to our contractors a particular firm, but the First Lord of the Admiralty questions whether the firm alluded to—Armstrong's—ought to be added to the list in view of the work they are already doing for the Admiralty. It must be remembered that all this time firms who do not contract with the Admiralty and some firms who do have been completing a considerable number of first-class armoured ships for foreign Powers, and I cannot help thinking that if the arrangement of prices is properly managed it would not be impossible for us to draw upon these firms ourselves which are completing ships for foreign Powers. Some of our own firms who have contracts with us have large contracts with foreign Powers. Armstrong's have contracts to complete ships for foreign Powers, and they have no ship contracts with us. In face of the fact that some eight or nine great firms are making propelling machinery of the first class and of the largest kind in this country for other Powers, and that several firms are building ships for other countries, I cannot believe that the productive power of this country is as short as it is supposed to be, and if the national emergency is as great as described by the First Lord himself and by the Prime Minister, our performance ought to be larger than it is, and when a programme has been agreed to by this House we ought not to fall short of that programme. The First Lord of the Admiralty has admitted—indeed, it is part of his case—that there has been a great slowness in carrying out his programme even such as it is. He has pointed out how slow we have been both in contract ships and in dockyard ships in regard to propelling machinery and armour plate. The House is often reassured by the more optimistic class of speakers that we have such extraordinary powers of building ships fast in this country that we can afford to be behind other Powers. That is not the view of the First Lord now, and he has not recently made use of that argument. Nevertheless, it is very often used in the country, and we very often read it in the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite. We have got ourselves into the habit of falling behind with our ships. The engineering strike has been given as the alleged reason for all our difficulties, and no doubt that strike had a continuing effect beyond the actual moment of the lock-out, and its effects were felt in subsequent years. But the delay in the ships is continuing to be very great indeed, and I would like to give the House two or three examples. In the March, 1896 programme the "Albion" was to have been completed in August, 1899, but that ship is not now expected to be completed until September, 1901. The "Glory" in the same programme, although not so much behind, is also very late, but the excuse in this case is the financial difficulty of the contractor for engines. There was a Japanese ship of the same character which was begun at the same time by the same contractor, and which was delivered more rapidly and completed. As regards the March, 1897, programme the same thing occurred again. The "Formidable," the "Irresistible," and the "Implacable" were to have been completed in March, 1900, but they are not yet complete. This is a matter about which the Committee ought to have some information. In the case of these three ships the excuse is that the delay is caused by a difficulty as to parts of the armour. This matter of armour has been brought before this Committee year after year by specialists representing either the trade or the constituencies concerned, and I think it has been gone into no less than eight times within the last four years. I confess that I think this difficulty in regard to armour ought to have been overcome by now. No doubt changes in the plant have been required, but the First Lord of the Admiralty admitted last year that we must get the plant, and that if we could not get it by one plan we must get it by another. Although I should prefer to do this by the ordinary form of contract in the open market, yet we must obtain this even if we have to go into partnership with manufacturers. Again, the ships of the "Duncan" class—the "Duncan," the "Cornwallis," the "Exmouth," and the "Russell," of the revised programme of 1898—are very backward, and are more backward than the corresponding Russian ships which they were designed to match. If you take the case as put before me in the very excellent tables published in the last Naval Annual it will be seen that only three battleships have really been completed in the two years immediately preceding the publication of the last Naval Annual. Of the battleships provided by the March, 1896, programme only half—namely, three out of six—have been completed up to the present time. In the most recent debate in the French Chamber on this subject, when they discussed the whole question of the possibility of war between France and this country, it was clear that battleships have again come to the front, and we must be prepared to see a considerable accession to the number of battleships possessed by foreign Powers. I do not suppose that anyone would press the right hon. Gentleman to revise his programme at this moment in regard to the contracts for additional battleships. As regards cruisers it may be taken as admitted that we are short. The reason given for this deficiency and for not laying down more cruisers is the difficulty of obtaining propelling machinery.

MR. GOSCHEN: And armour.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I was only repeating the reason given in this House as to propelling machinery—one which has been given for a long time. The first class cruisers promised in the March, 1896, programme for completion before March, 1900, are not yet complete, and they will very soon have been five years in hand. The excuse given, as in the case of the battleships "Albion" and "Glory" in the same programme, is the financial difficulties of the contractor for engines. The third class cruisers in the same programme are almost as backward, and the armoured cruisers of the revised programme of 1897, which are ships very urgently needed at the present time, according to the statement of the First Lord, are already a year behind time. As regards ordered cruisers of the 1898 programme, twenty-three-knot cruisers, urgently needed, on the average were not laid down until fifteen months after the announcement made in the House, and the ordered cruisers of the revised programme of 1898 not until eighteen months afterwards. In some cases the Admiralty found it necessary to accelerate the dates of launching, although they do not finish the ships. That is the case not only with contract ships, but also with yard ships, like the "Drake" and "Lex," which, I think, are to be hurried forward to no good end, as Pembroke Dock is insufficiently equipped. The Admirals of the fighting squadrons are not satisfied with the number of cruisers at their disposition at the present time, and I cannot but think that to commission additional cruisers would be a more reasonable precaution than to adopt life clubs. The First Lord has announced the purchase of five destroyers, and he has stated that that is a considerable addition to the strength of this country. We reproached him in February last with not having provided more destroyers, and he now tells us that he was thinking of purchasing these destroyers at the time, but he did not announce the fact because it would put up the price against himself. I confess that I think this is a welcome purchase, although I think that an even larger addition to the number of destroyers would have been wise. My main reason for rising and taking part in this debate is my conviction that the resources of the country are sufficient, if properly used, to fill up the programme which the First Lord of the Admiralty himself thinks is necessary, and the difficulty of obtaining armour and propelling machinery, although it may be a convenient argument to use once, when some particular shortness may have occurred, is an unsound argument, and is not a proper excuse when it is alleged to the House year by year. In face of the fact that we are building for foreign countries at a time when there is a national emergency, I think we ought to be able to obtain sufficient propelling machinery and armour.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Undoubtedly the right hon. Baronet has put his finger on a radical defect in the management of the Admiralty, if not in its intelligence. It is undoubtedly true that this country is capable of building as many battleships and cruisers, and producing as much armour, as is required. I am going to go a little further and suggest that the reason may possibly be that the Admiralty have never yet understood how to deal with contractors, for they beat them down in their prices in an absurd way.

MR. GOSCHEN: Under our present system we do not beat the prices down. We invite tenders, but we do not always accept the lowest.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I really cannot weary the Committee by going into details, although I have them here. The case I had in my mind was one of seven years ago when tenders were invited for torpedo destroyers. Tenders were given by two firms, one of which was Messrs. Yarrow. That tender was not accepted; they would not do it for the money; and they were then offered a little more. It was a case of beating up instead of beating down, but it is the same principle. You must deal with your contractors in a proper and even generous way. If you do not, the result will be that the best contractors will not work for you, but will fill their yards with foreign work when they should be working for us. I have heard that continually alleged, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean goes so far as to suggest a reason. I think there may be other reasons. There may be, for instance, a want of proper foresight on the part of the Admiralty, and, consequently, too great a delay in ordering the armour required. I believe that is largely the case. If you want the best work you must go to the best contractors; if you want the best contractors you must treat them fairly, and even handsomely. As to this question of armour, it is absurd to say that this country cannot produce armour sufficient for the needs of the Navy. But let us assume for a moment that the private contractor cannot produce the armour required. Then I say it is possible for the Admiralty—nay, it is the duty of the Admiralty—to do one of two things; either, as the right hon. Baronet has suggested, to go into a quasi-partnership with the armour producers, and by promise of orders induce manufacturers to put up machinery to carry out the work, or to take the bull by the horns and set up rolling machinery in the dockyards. You have had to take a similar course with regard to the building of ships, and if there is no other way, you must do it with regard to the supply of armour. But to come year after year and say that you cannot get this, and you cannot get that, in a manufacturing country of the illimitable capacities of this country, is really to give a reason which cannot be readily accepted by the House of Commons for not carrying out the naval programme which we have been told is the least that is absolutely essential. I come now to the question of boilers, and that seems to me to be even more important. I am afraid I must believe that the boilers we have in the larger number of our most important ships are not satisfactory. If that is so, we may at any moment find this country in a state of most horrible danger. Everybody must feel that great events are impending—great events in the East, great events in Europe—and we never know the day when we may be called upon to put forth what is after all our only power—our sea power. If it be that there are conditions in our ships which are such that those ships cannot be relied upon for service in emergency or generally, if there be some serious fundamental fault in their machinery or boilers, or in both, which render them unreliable—capable of doing great things on one day and breaking down the next, for goodness knows how long—if we are in that position, we are in the most serious position that the country could possibly be in, and one which it behoves Her Majesty's Government to deal with immediately. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, has indeed given away his case. He admits, or he does not dispute, that, on the whole, the water-tube boiler has been unsatisfactory.

MR. GOSCHEN was understood to dissent.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I will put it in another way. The right hon. Gentleman admits there was great uneasiness about it—so great an uneasiness that even he himself could not remove it. Therefore, I think the case is admittedly, on his own words, a very very serious one.

Mr. Gibson Bowles.

MR. GOSCHEN was understood to explain that the defects were remediable.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I do not wish to put it in the least higher than the right hon. Gentleman himself put it. He said the defects in his opinion were remediable, but the apprehension was not remediable. I want to make one remark on the right hon. Gentleman's speech because I do not think he has apprehended the case against the boilers. He speaks all through of the water-tube boiler. My belief is, and I think it is the belief of a great many Members of this House, that the water-tube principle—that is, the principle of putting the water instead of the fire into the tubes—is a good principle. I am not an expert on this question, but I have endeavoured to acquaint myself with the subject, and that is the belief I have come to. The only question is whether the Belleville boiler is good. Here is a Memorandum prepared for this very debate. What do we find there? I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman wrote it; I imagine not; the English is not good enough. What the writer of this paper says is this—

“The Admiralty policy has been to consider the Belleville boiler, with which they have had more experience than any other type of water-tube boiler, as the approved type for large ships.”

“Water-tube boilers” here, then, does not mean water-tube boilers in general, but the type approved by the Admiralty—the Belleville. The water-tube boiler may be good; it may be the most perfect invention the brain of man has ever put into a steam engine; but if the Belleville be bad it is no answer to us. The writer further says—

“But in this paper it is only necessary to compare the Belleville boiler with the cylindrical boiler.”

That is all that is necessary to do to-night, but that is the very thing the right hon. Gentleman has not done. He has all through compared water-tube boilers generally with cylindrical boilers. I do not care what he proves about water-tube boilers, if it be true, as I am afraid it is true, that our particular form of water-tube boiler—the Belleville—is unsatisfactory and cannot be trusted. The right hon. Gentleman is good enough to say he will not find it difficult to deal with me as an adversary. He will not. I recognise the great power and capacity, ormous energy and industry, which right hon. Gentleman has brought to his work. The Committee must realise the almost masterly engineering in which the right hon. Gentleman described the water-tube boiler to the Committee, stating frankly many of its defects and mentioning still more frankly many excellencies, involved a great deal of work not altogether familiar to Members of this House. I will not go into details; I will not even read the facts set out in the Memorandum showing how many of the trials on which the Admiralty, the ship with the Belleville boiler drank nearly six times as much water as the ship with the cylindrical boiler. That is a very serious matter, and so it is not the water only. The extra water means extra coal, and therefore every extra pound of water that the Belleville boiler drinks means more coal for the ship to distil it. There is one other point. The right hon. Gentleman drew a distinction between the two kinds of water-tube boilers. He spoke of the large sort and the small sort—that is, the large water-tube boiler with large tubes and the small water-tube boiler with small tubes—as though they were two beings of totally different races coming from different countries. But they are the same boiler. The essential principle of the two is the same, and it is possible to make the small water-tube boiler with larger tubes and fit it into a larger vessel. That is exactly what the French are doing; they are fitting large vessels with water-tube boilers of the torpedo-boat destroyer sort, but made with larger tubes—such as the Normand, Yarrow, the Thornycroft, and the St. John. The right hon. Gentleman rather objected to the Committee—I do not think he meant to do it, but it was the inference suggested to us who do not know much about boilers—that for large ships you must have large tube boilers, and for small ships small tube boilers, and consequently you must have the Belleville boiler for large ships, although it might have the Thornycroft or the Yarrow for the small.

MR. GOSCHEN explained that he did not intend to convey that impression; he meant that small water-tube boilers are generally provided for the smaller ships.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I quite accept the right hon. Gentleman's statement that he did not intend to convey that idea, but in the unsophisticated frame of mind with which I endeavour to approach all new questions that was the inference suggested to me. The Memorandum states and the right hon. Gentleman says that one of the great advantages of the Belleville boiler is that you get less weight. I think the hon. Gentleman below the gangway rather disposed of that when he showed that although you get less weight in the machinery and in the boilers, you get as much weight in the coal.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: And more.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Then, says the right hon. Gentleman and also the Memorandum, you get better speed. My hon. friend opposite shakes his head. I am going to assume that do you get better speed. But when do you get it? Perhaps on one day in twenty, when the boiler is going properly, you get your extra knot, but on the next—

MR. GOSCHEN complained that that was a most unjust description; it was just the same as in other ships.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I think not. If hon. Members will refer to this Memorandum they will see that they act unlike other ships. Take the "High-flyer" and the "Minerva." The former was continually breaking down; the latter never. I do not say it always happened, but you cannot rely on it not happening, and reliance is the very essence of the action of the Fleet. The old cylindrical boiler may not have had the advantages—I think it had not—that the water-tube boiler has, but at any rate you could always rely upon it, week in, week out—nay, year in, year out. For year after year the cylindrical boilers have gone on with a little looking into at the end of each voyage, and they have done their work perfectly well. The "Royal Arthur" at the present moment can get as good a speed with her cylindrical boilers as when she was built twenty-five or thirty years ago. As to the foreigner, I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman, we must sweep away our national prejudice if we can.

learn anything by so doing. I am most anxious to learn everything possible from the foreigner. What does the foreigner teach us? Let us see what is found in this Memorandum. I will summarise it in a very short way. All foreign nations, says the Memorandum, have adopted water-tube boilers. Yes; but not the Belleville. The Belleville boiler is the only one with which I am concerned, as sixty-one of our largest ships are fitted with it. We have in the Memorandum an account of what the different nations have done. The really important marine nations are these—and I put them in order of importance: England, France, United States, Holland, and Germany. What have we to learn from the foreigners? Germany uses the Thornycroft, the Schültz, the Niclausse, and the Dürr boilers; but out of the thirty ships named in this Memorandum only two have Belleville boilers. In Holland every boiler—on large ships, too—of 10,000 indicated horse-power is a Yarrow with the larger tubes. There are eight of these ships in the list, and not one of them has a Belleville boiler. In the United States they use the Thornycroft, the Babcock and Wilcox, the Niclausse, and the Mosher; but in all the nineteen ships named there is not a single Belleville boiler. Now I come to France, and this is really the crucial instance. It was in France the Belleville boiler was invented twenty-one years ago by a naval officer of very great scientific attainments and ability. With regard to the Belleville boiler, I have never been shipmates with it, as they say; but I have been alongside of it, and having seen a great deal of it was touched with a profound admiration for it. I remember having my doubts as to the wisdom of the policy adopted by Gentlemen on the other side when they first put this boiler, without any trial, in a big ship like the "Powerful" or the "Terrible." But in the "Sharpshooter" I conceived a great admiration for it, and I stood up in this House and said it was a very good boiler. That is one reason why I am here to-day—to put on a white sheet. In France, and this is most important, the earlier ships—I am now really confining myself to the list in the Memorandum—were all fitted with Belleville boilers, but if hon. Members will look at the Memorandum they will see what a change has been coming over the mind of France in regard to these boilers. Of fifteen cruisers of 1899 and 1900 only have Belleville boilers. That is in the original country of the Belleville boilers—France, in which it is a patriotism to use the Belleville boiler. The right hon. Gentleman will understand that I have no quarrel against Niclausse, the Yarrow, the Guyot, Babcock and Wilcox, or any other twenty types of boilers; my quarrel, my horror, are all reserved for Belleville alone. Of the fifteen cruisers armoured and protected, named in the Memorandum, only six have Belleville boilers. All battleships built in 1898 have Belleville boilers, but the 1899 and 1900 have not Belleville Niclausse boilers. The two latest ships on which the French mostly rely, and which have excited the honest fears of the right hon. Baronet of the "Suffren" and the "Henri IV," are the Niclausse boilers. First of all, that the figures I have brought forward with regard to France show that she is recovering from the Bazez craze, which she had in a strong way; she has now forty ships against sixty-one fitted with the Belleville, but she is recovering from that—and I make this assertion with responsibility as I have in this Country—the authorities responsible for naval construction believe that the Belleville boiler is bad in principle and to work in practice, and they have to believe in it as the boiler of the future. That is my assertion, and I make it on good grounds. My information is that, and, as the figures show a tendency to avoid the Belleville boiler on the part of the French Government, so I think the future will show to a certainty that the French Government have absolutely up the belief in the Belleville boiler on large ships. I have made a suggestion, but the right hon. Gentleman of the Naval Intelligence Department, an Ambassador in Paris, and he can tell whether I am right or wrong; he can in any way show that I am in what I have said, I shall be glad to retract it. I say this further—"Jeanne d'Arc" it is a Guyot boiler, I believe. There is really no difference between a boiler with small tubes and a boiler with large tubes; they are essentially the same, but if you use them in torpedo boats you with small tubes, and when you use in a large vessel you make them large tubes. All the arguments regard to foreign nations are arguments against the Belleville boilers, against water-tube boilers. The experience of the Admiralty action of many, Holland, the United States, of France herself, is an experience which should induce us to give up these Belleville boilers. But we have got them sixty-one of our ships, and we have got to live with them. Here I am in entire agreement with the hon. Gentleman near me. The human element does come in, and I am afraid that the Admiralty have not always taken sufficient account of that human element. The Belleville boiler is like a box of tricks as never before was known to a ship. It is like a lady's watch, getting out of order and requiring delicate handling. It requires to be looked after to a nicety, and when defects occur they require to be repaired to a nicety. If you are to live with the Belleville boiler you must treat stoking no longer as unskilled or quasi-unskilled labour; it is a fine art, and you require artists to do it. How are you to get them? Other nations have been in the same difficulty as we are in, but France got out of the difficulty by doing as I now venture humbly to suggest the right hon. Gentleman should do—namely, obtain instruction from the Belleville Company itself in stoking as a fine art. Will the right hon. Gentleman do that? I feel very strongly the urgency of this matter. I believe that no other Belleville boilers ought to be put into Her Majesty's ships, but we have sixty-one ships with them, and the right hon. Gentleman should take the means open to his hand for using them to the best advantage. Let him set up a school of stoking, and send for two or three French stokers from the Belleville Company, to teach our men the art of stoking. Those men could then teach others, and in course of time we should learn to stoke the Belleville boiler. You cannot do it by leaving it to the unskilled stoker to learn it by himself, or if he should learn it in that way he will learn it too late. It may gall the pride of the right hon. Gentleman to go to France to be taught stoking, but this is a French dish, and if you wish to enjoy it you must have it done by a French cook. There is no other way. I do hope the right hon.

Gentleman, in the presence of these enormous accusations—to some extent ill-founded, but largely well-founded—will immediately take means—there is not a day to be lost—to teach his stokers how to stoke the Belleville boiler. The right hon. Gentleman is to appoint a Committee of experts; they are to go to sea; they are to be shipmates—

MR. GOSCHEN: Some of them.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Some of them are to be shipmates of the Belleville boiler in order to see how it acts. I am not sure that that experience could not be obtained without any difficulty at all. I am not sure the captains and commanders of Her Majesty's Navy could not unfold to the right hon. Gentleman a tale about the Belleville boiler which would harrow the First Lord's soul. I have heard tales. I know nothing about engineering, but what struck me was constantly hearing executive officers of Her Majesty's Navy groaning and complaining of the awful job they had in getting the Belleville boilers to act properly. Will the right hon. Gentleman take any steps to ascertain the views of the executive officers of the Navy? I do not say even of the engineers, because they are in rather a false position; they have to report to the man who adopted the boiler, and who also looks after their promotion—and here let me say that I am not sure that that arrangement will not require to be looked after. I am not sure that the methods by which we design our ships and boilers do not require a great deal of overhauling. The chief engineer is an admirable person, but he is an engine driver in essence; his business is to drive an engine, not to design one.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY said the engineers were individually of the highest type of men they could possibly get.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I am not speaking of the individual engineer. This engineer has to look after the material, and keep it going. I am not quite sure that we have not entered on a new period as regards the navy. I am quite certain that the right hon. Gentleman and the Board of Admiralty come to their work with the highest determination to do the best they can for the country. No one could have greater determination in that direction than the right hon. Gentleman, but then he is constantly being told by Navy Leagues and halfpenny newspapers that the Admiralty is an effete institution. There was a time when we were told that if steam were adopted in the Navy it would be the downfall of the Fleet, and there was also great difficulty in introducing breech-loading guns. The modern Admiral now says to himself, "I will not be open to that reproach; I will keep up to the times," and he is consequently apt to run to the other extreme and to indulge in a debauch of novelty. I regret the changes which are being made, especially as regards the training squadron, but I regret most of all the change which was made in boilers and machinery without adequate trial in 1893. I am glad the right hon. gentleman has volunteered a Committee. It was not forced upon him, and I hope it will do good work. I trust in the meantime the right hon. Gentleman will take immediate steps to increase the number of stokers for the boilers we have already got, in order that we may get better results than hitherto—such results as at any rate will make us feel comparatively safe in trusting our Navy and our sailors to the Belleville boilers.

*MR. ALLAN: I rise with feelings of great gratification. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty on his patriotism in agreeing to appoint an expert Committee to inquire into the whole question of the boiler of Her Majesty's ships. That question when I entered the House six years ago came home to me. When the great plunge was made, and when millions of money were blindly thrown into the business, I saw that a mistake was being committed, and I did not hesitate to tell the then Administration that they were making a powerful mistake and a terrible blunder. The late Secretary of State to the Admiralty laughs, but he does not know what a boiler is. Probably he laughs because he has left such a legacy to his successors; but laughing will not make a strong Navy or save Britain in the hour of danger, and I do not like to see an ex-Minister laughing. We have been told to-day that the "Powerful" and the "Terrible" have done everything. But what have they done? Let the truth be known. What did the "Powerful" do going out to China? She made 1,500 miles in ten days, and although it is a boat designed to do 22 knots has never done it. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman now to take out of Portsmouth Dockyard the "Powerful" and see if she can do 22 knots after only months steaming. She cannot do it. Why is not a list of the defects of the "Powerful" inserted in the Hansard? I will tell the House. The defects are so great that the Admiralty feared to put them in. What has the "Terrible" done? She has run from Hong Kong to Takou in a grave national emergency when the lives of a British Minister and his attachés in Peking were in jeopardy. How long did she take? Did she do 22 knots? Never. She did not do 15 knots, and, forsooth, these are the boilers we are to do great things, and which the First Lord of the Admiralty, on the authority of the so-called experts, approved. Of course, I am not blaming the right hon. Gentleman. Take the "Europa." What has she done? She was designed to do 20 knots, and she ran from Suez to Colombo at the magnificent speed of 20 knots, and, forsooth, this ship, designed to do 20 knots, took eighty-eight days on her trip to Sydney. Why, a sailing ship could have done it in the time. It is a disgrace to British engineering, and on our supremacy, that a ship designed to do 22 knots cannot do it. None of our ships can do it. I stand on facts, and I think that a great many hon. Members in this House have perhaps never seen a Belleville boiler. There are actually 48,000 joints connected with the boilers of H.M.S. "Terrible." Think of that at the end of the nineteenth century. Shade of James Watt and Stephenson! We are now spending millions in putting boilers into ships with 48,000 joints, when the true spirit of engineering science ought to be to have fewer joints the better. That is the reason of their failure, I think, fear that these boilers will lead to serious explosions which are bound to come at unexpected moments. Take the "Hermes." She was sent out to the West India station, and ere she reached it was found that the boilers were burnt. She was towed into Nassau, but they could not repair her there. She was then towed to Port Royal, and could not be repaired there, and had to be towed to Bermuda. What happened to her? I am quite willing to admit that the feed

a little wrong, but granted they were not working well, there was so little left in the boilers that it evaporated in minutes, the boilers became red hot, the men panic stricken, and a lieutenant was sent down from the deck to stop the men, who were almost in a state of mutiny, in the stokehole. I feel sorry for the chief engineer. I will tell you why. His life must have been miserable. Night and day he was on duty; and, being in dread of a black mark against his name, he dared not open his mouth. He was never off watch, and when the ship got to Bermuda he was invalided home. Get his report and defects list. The "Hermes" is a fine sample of British engineering. It is a beautiful sample, and she is not fit to do a bit of work now. Take another case, the "Diadem," which we were told to-night was such a success. I have seen a letter which states that hundreds of her tubes had to be taken out—they were all pin-holed; and the letter states that if all the facts were known as to the amount the "Diadem" cost to repair they would stagger humanity. The pin-holed tubes were put into hot zinc in order to close up the holes, and then they were put back again into the boilers. I should like to show the right hon. Gentleman some facts which his officials have not laid before him. The Memorandum which has been issued is a melancholy example of misapplied engineering effort. I never read such a miserable account coming from men who call themselves engineers. Why, a three years apprentice would not have written such stuff.

MR. GOSCHEN: I must protest against the hon. Gentleman doing what he has done before. He attacks not only the scientific knowledge of the experts, but he also attacks them for not putting the facts before me. Against that I protest.

*MR. ALLAN: I am relying on the Memorandum. I have not attacked any man, and I can only judge by what is given to me. What I want to bring home to the right hon. Gentleman is that all through the Memorandum at every opportunity there is disparagement of the cylindrical boiler. What are the facts? If you compare the old "Impérieuse," fitted with the cylindrical boilers, and the modern "Diadem," with the water-

tube boilers, it will be found that the first is fit for sea, can go anywhere, and is as good at her work to-day as the day she came out, and that, if pitted against the "Diadem" from here to the Cape, in a steady spin, or across the Atlantic, she would win, and on far less coals. Again, in the trials between the "Minerva" and the "Highflyer," the "Highflyer" had from forty to fifty tons of water in her tanks, whereas the "Minerva" had none. Now if the "Highflyer" had been under similar conditions to the "Minerva," it is evident that she could not have done her run at all, as she required this water for her water-tube boilers, while the "Minerva" required none for her cylindrical boilers; this was not pointed out in the Memorandum. Then there is the case of the "Pegasus," fitted with water-tube boilers. She had been for fifteen months on commission on the South American station; and what has happened? The water-tube boilers have to be refitted and she is ordered home, and the "Sappho," with cylindrical boilers, was sent to take her place. How much steaming has the "Pegasus" done altogether? I question if she has done two months, and then you send out a cylindrical boilered ship to take her place. Why did you not send out any other water-tube boilered ship, if the "Pegasus" had proved satisfactory? The idea of the Admiralty officials as to the value of water-tube boilers is absurd and cannot be borne out by facts. Even on the chief engineer's admission there is no saving in weight, although he says that there is a gain in speed. Speed is a matter of form, displacement, and power, and not a matter of the type of boiler, and to say that you can get a knot more because of a certain type of boiler, is a piece of engineering bluff. We are told by Members of this House that these boilers have come to stay; but if they have come to stay, the engineer critic has come to stay also, and will stay as long as they remain, and until the existing evils are removed. When we talk of this country, of which we all are proud, what do we see? That from the old boiler has arisen all our country's greatness. It has built up our present mercantile supremacy, and has carried our Army with all its impedimenta to South Africa. Of the 240 or 250 transport steamers employed for the war, not one was fitted with water-tube boilers.

Now the country's first line of defence is provided with boilers which are not to be depended on, while for simplicity, economy, and the peace of mind of the engineering staff nothing can equal the cylindrical boilers. The cylindrical boiler has made Britain what it is, and if they are not used in our Navy, so as to give us a sure superiority over other nations, then I say farewell to the greatness of Britain on the seas. Once her naval power is destroyed, she will go down as did Carthage of old.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): We have had the usual protest from the hon. Member for Gateshead against water-tube boilers, and I wish now to draw the attention of the Committee away from that subject. The hon. Member, who appears to have water-tube boilers on the brain, laboured the question, but now that the First Lord of the Admiralty has granted a Committee, which I regret has been granted at all, we may pass from the subject. It is not true that these boilers were not tested. They were very well tested by engineers of standing, who took passages on vessels fitted with these boilers to and from Australia and reported on them. I cannot agree with my hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn, that France is discarding the Belleville type. France is using two or three kinds of water-tube boilers, and let us do the same. Russia has also taken up water-tube boilers for the fleet she is now building, and it is all nonsense for hon. Members in this House to find fault with the policy of the Admiralty because they have adopted a boiler which has failed in a few ships. My hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn made some very useful observations. I would remind the House that we have never taken up a new invention without encountering difficulties. I remember when steam was first introduced and there was then great difficulty, but we did not discard steam. I remember also when rifles were introduced for the first time, but we did not throw them overboard. Neither will we throw over these water-tube boilers. It is all nonsense for hon. Members to make theatrical protests in this House in this age of reform and progress. If the House wants an illustration of the advantages of a water-tube boiler, let them turn to page 15 of the Memorandum, where it is stated—

"The advantage of quickly raising steam was illustrated in the case of the 'Niobe' at Palmas, when the 'Persia' transport broke shaft, and was nearly on the rocks. The 'Niobe' was able to get up steam and give her assistance in 1½ hours from the time of receiving the news. With cylindrical boilers it would have required five or six hours."

The First Lord has granted a Committee. I regret it, because it is a concession to clamour without much backing behind it. However, the right hon. Gentleman has granted it, and there is nothing more to be said. Let me pass away from this subject, and let me say how pleased I am at the Supplementary Estimate which has been introduced, and that the First Lord and his advisers have decided on these new torpedo boat destroyers and also on the repairing ships. All this is most meritorious, and makes up for the shortcomings in the fulfilment of the Admiralty programme for the past year. I agree with much that has been said by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, who always speaks with great weight on this subject, and no civilian has studied the question more closely than he has. I agree with what he says about the shipbuilding programme being thrown into arrears because firms take foreign contracts which pay them better. This is a vital matter. We have no right to run any risks, and I do not think that any adequate defence has been made by the Admiralty for the non-fulfilment of their programme. The engineers' strike no doubt explains part of it, but that is not sufficient justification. I stated the facts to a friend outside this House who is conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and he used language of the most un-Parliamentary character. He intimated plainly that the statements which were made in this House were not in accordance with facts. The matter is so vital to this Empire that I would do anything in my power to prevent foreign contracts being placed in this country as long as our own naval programme was unfinished. If an Act of Parliament were introduced to check the execution of foreign contracts in this country when our own contracts are left behind, I would vote for it. We are behind France with our building programme, although we have had some extension through the pressure of the public press. I have been much impressed with the important experipoints of a crucial character made on the Belleisle." Of course no one is allowed to go on board, but anyone can go into the dockyard, and by merely looking at the vessel there and judging for one's self, one cannot fail to be struck with what the result would be of the next naval engagement. Nothing in these Estimates can make a proper provision for a reserve of battleships and armoured cruisers. We are very deficient indeed in cruisers. The late Sir George Hornby laid down what would be a sufficient number of cruisers, but the Admiralty are following his advice much too slowly. We are told that the programme presented to us is equal to that of any two Powers. That is not a proper comparison at all. Bother other flags! Our Navy should be equal in battleships, cruisers, and every other vessel of war to our Imperial necessities and our great responsibilities. A distinguished Admiral in high command, at a public banquet the other day, spoke out his mind freely before the country, and said that we are greatly deficient in battleships and cruisers. I am speaking not my own opinion, which may be worth nothing, but that of one whose views are entitled to weight and respect, and I do not hesitate to say that the Admiralty are behind the times; and woe be unto any nation that is not prepared when the hour of trial comes upon it. I am well aware that the First Lord of the Admiralty is deeply convinced of the necessities of the case, and I know that he possesses the confidence of the Service in all its branches; but that does not make me shut my eyes blindly to the facts. Our programme is not completed, and the money voted by this House has not been expended. We are in arrears, and will be in arrears. I would like to have referred to the turbine ship "Viper," which has developed a speed of forty-three miles an hour. That is marvellous, and I would like to know whether the Admiralty have it in their mind to extend that system of propulsion. The "Belleisle" experiments must have taught the Admiralty the enormous importance of more largely adopting electric power in all our battleships and cruisers for working the guns and other machinery which now require to be worked by steam power. In these days, with steam worked at 250 lb. to 300 lb. pressure, if a steam pipe were cut by shot or shell, the result would be very serious indeed. Electric power is very largely adopted in the American

Navy for working the turrets and all the other machinery, and I hope the Admiralty will in that respect follow the example of the United States. Wires can be carried all over the ship out of sight, and are not likely to be injured in the hour of battle. In conclusion, I may say that I do not share the views uttered in this House by the opponents of water-tube boilers, and I, for one, regret the appointment of the Committee, although I have no doubt that the result of the inquiry will be the triumphant success of these boilers.

MR. C. H. WILSON (Hull, W.): I think I ought, having had more, perhaps, practical experience of the working of water-tube boilers at sea than any other member of the House, to give to the House the results of that experience, which certainly do not bear out the violent charges made by the hon. Member for Gateshead. I do not think we have gone far enough back in this story. When this patent was introduced into the Navy a difficulty had arisen in regard to the old cylindrical boilers in making them strong enough and heavy enough to do their work. It might have been a mistaken policy on the part of the Board of Admiralty, but I was under the impression that the cylindrical boilers in the old ships of war would not have passed the requirements of the Board of Trade for mercantile steamers. If that be so, it may account for some of the difficulties which arose from the use of the cylindrical boilers. The Admiralty, therefore, may have thought that something might be done with water-tube boilers, which were then coming to the front, and were being used in foreign navies. About the same time this country became subject to one of these constantly recurring scares as to the sufficiency of our naval defence, which every now and again make their way into the House of Commons. The Government of the day were pressed to build more ships as speedily as possible, and even to-night we have had hon. Members below the gangway complaining that they still do not build vessels fast enough. That is not a fault confined to the Admiralty. We in the mercantile marine cannot get our ships built up to time. Our experience is that when we order ships to be built by a certain time the shipbuilders take almost double the contract period, or at least make a very considerable addition to it; so that the Admiralty, after all, may not be so much at fault as some hon. Gentlemen allege. Water-tube boilers forced themselves on the attention of the Admiralty to remedy several of the evils of the old cylindrical boilers. Then the Belleville boiler, in a way, became the fashion, with its high-sounding name; and, even after the Admiralty Memorandum has been pulled to pieces, it has been shown that, at great expense, many of the foreign Admiralties are using these Belleville boilers. The use of the water-tube boiler at sea is a new thing, but on land it was not new. Hon. Members on this side of the House have had many years experience of water-tube boilers, although I am not at the moment going to refer to any special water-tube boilers. When the Admiralty once embarked on the use of water-tube boilers, after the country and the House drove them forward to build more ships as quickly as possible, they had no time to make experiments with different classes of water-tube boilers. Even now, after so many years experience, I personally have been almost gratified to find, from the Memorandum of the Admiralty, that matters are not so bad as they might be. That is faint praise; but what has struck me is that perhaps the Admiralty practice has been somewhat lax in their designing and supervision of construction, not of the boilers only, but of the machinery of the ships on which the success of the boilers more or less depends. If the machinery gives way, or there are leakages and other faults, these react on the boilers, and do not give them the fair chance they ought to have. I think the Admiralty practice must have been considerably at fault when we see the long list of defects published in this Memorandum. Last year I was told by the captain of one of the ships of the Mediterranean Squadron that the feed-pipes were so bad that they could not keep the boilers supplied with water; and consequently, if the ship had encountered bad weather, there would have been great danger of her loss, leaving out of the question altogether the fighting capabilities of the ship. Again, these defects are not confined to the Admiralty ships alone. The same faults are to be found in the mercantile marine, partly on account of the latest forms of machinery both in naval and mercantile ships. No doubt this increase of pressure has created the difficulties. I was told the other day by a naval captain that the French authorities avoid to a great extent many of the faults which are shown in the Admiralty Memorandum by not working their ships at the full pressure which the boilers are capable of. If that be so, the French ships might develop the same faults under similar conditions. It is constantly being asked why do not the ships steam at the highest speeds; and complaints are made that they do not. I imagine that the Admiralty authorities in too many instances, in their attempts to attain these highest speeds, have worn the machinery, for long distances too, at a greater pressure than is desirable or wise on their part. Take the experience of my own firm. To some extent we found the same faults with the old cylindrical boilers which the Admiralty did; and we have in the same way asked ourselves how these things could be remedied. Water-tube boilers were brought before us eight years ago, and one was put in the ship called "Nero," which has been continuously at work ever since. How many thousands of joints it has I do not know, but practically they have given us no trouble. I will give our experience with water-tube boilers, in the hope that it may be of some interest to the House, to the Admiralty, and likewise, possibly, to the country, because a scare has arisen that these water-tube boilers are inefficient, and that we are likely to have the terrible catastrophes predicted by my hon. friend the Member for Gateshead. In 1893 we got to work with the "Nero," and since then she has made seventy-nine voyages, and run 165,965 knots. In 1895 we built the steamer called the "Hero."

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): Were these fitted with the Belleville boilers?

MR. C. H. WILSON: No; they were fitted with Babcock's English water-tube boilers. The "Hero" made 257 voyages out and home, that is from Hull to continental ports and back again, and ran 131,045 knots. In 1896 we took the old cylindrical boilers out of another of our steamers in the same way as we had done with the "Nero," and put in water-tube boilers in her; and she has made 104 voyages, and run 106,293 knots. In 1897 we did the same thing with Orlando," which has made sixty-voyages, and run 84,306 knots. 1898 the old cylindrical boilers were out of the "Rollo," and water-tube boilers substituted, and she has made nine voyages, and run 53,975 knots. 1898 the "Otto" was built for the weekly continental trade, and was with water-tube boilers. She has ninety-nine voyages, and run 84 knots. In the same year "Duello," a new vessel, was with water-tube boilers. She made ninety-four voyages, and run 91 knots. In 1899 the cylindrical boilers were taken out of the "Tasso," water-tube boilers put in. She has twenty-seven voyages, and run 1046 knots. This steamer makes frequent voyages from Hull to the West coast of Norway, and carries a great many of our friends backward and forward with perfect safety. Summing up the results of all these steamers, I find that they have made 800 voyages and run 700,000 knots, and practically we have not experienced all the dangers and difficulties that have been predicted. I do not say that the water-tube boilers are perfect. As we go on we get more knowledge, the same as the Admiralty are getting; and we are now getting as near perfect as possible. We have steamers running to America once a week, and we are taking the cylindrical boilers out of them and putting in water-tube boilers. In a few weeks they would be running a voyage of 7,000 miles, and that will give a very good test. Taking the other side of the question, in 1895 we had Belleville boilers put into the "Ohio," but they were not satisfactory, and we took them out after runs of 111,000 knots to America and back. These were the first Belleville boilers constructed by Molesworth so far as the mercantile marine is concerned; and possibly they were not a fair test of the system. No doubt the experience of the Admiralty has been somewhat unsatisfactory; but at the same time I think the Admiralty deserves the greatest credit for taking up this great question, and not allowing it to become a matter of party politics—one Government blaming another for doing this or not doing the other thing. I hope the appointment of this Committee, which I am glad the Admiralty has promised, will lead to satisfactory results. Personally I feel convinced that the Admiralty will never go back again to the use of cylindrical boilers. I have heard it stated from the other side of the House, by the hon. Member for Gateshead, that there is no saving in the weight by the use of water-tube boilers. That is a great mistake. There is an enormous saving in weight. The hon. Member is correct when he says that the weight of the water-tube boiler itself is not less than that of the cylindrical. But he omits altogether the enormous weight of the water in the cylindrical boilers as compared with that in the water-tube boilers; and it is self-evident that that is a very great advantage, more especially in the Navy. But even in the case of the mercantile marine, as a practical ship-owner, I think it is a great advantage. Take one of our smaller ships: there is a saving of twenty tons of water. And if that ship makes fifty trips from Hull to the Continent and back, that is 100 in all. They could, by the use of water-tube boilers, carry 5,000 tons more cargo. This advantageous saving of weight the Admiralty could put into guns or engines. Personally, I think they ought to put it into guns, because I have been told that French men-of-war are better armed than our English ships. I understand that the Admiralty utilise the saving in weight by taking in more coal, instead of increasing the defensive and offensive power of the ships. But in the Boer war we have found that the range of guns is all-important; and I hope that those Gentlemen who are responsible for the Navy will take a lesson from that, and increase the armament rather than the coals. It would be much better if they carried their coal with them in colliers, and so made our ships more efficient than those of any other country. What I have said I hope will be taken for what it is worth. It is my opinion against that of hon. Members who have always taken an opposite view. I repeat that our first steamer fitted with water-tube boilers eight years ago is yet at work, and we have no reason to complain of it. I presume, therefore, I can speak with a certain amount of authority on this subject. If my experience tends in any way to allay the scare which has been excited in this country in regard to this matter, I feel that I shall have done what little I could to assist the Admiralty in what, no doubt, is a very difficult position, but which it is the duty of the House to make as easy as possible for them.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland) said his hon. friend the Member for Hull, in alluding to water-tube boilers —

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Dr. TANNER, Cork Co., Mid). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (continuing) said the Memorandum which had just been issued by the Admiralty to hon. Members dealt entirely with boilers of the Belleville type. There was no charge against the manufacturers of such boilers as were made by Messrs. Babcock and Wilcox. In regard to vessels fitted with water-tube boilers the main charge was that the amount of speed for which they were originally designed had never been attained in a single vessel, and the Memorandum, to his mind, with regard to the performances of this type of boiler was neither more nor less than a piece of special pleading. The Memorandum commenced by admitting an enormous number of defects in connection with this type of boiler, and the reason assigned in the Memorandum for the defects not having been remedied and overcome in the long series—he might say years—of experiments was want of knowledge and ability on the part of the engineers and artificers who man the engine-room. That was, to his mind, an unnecessary reflection upon the engineers employed by the Admiralty, and so far from this type of boiler being complex and difficult to superintend, he believed that nothing was so easily managed. He had himself gone into the boiler-rooms of the "Powerful," and an explanation was given to him by the engineers. He saw nothing whatever difficult in connection with the manning and working of these boilers, the defect being not in the management but in connection with the type of boiler itself. Owing to the many defects in these boilers which had been developed in the course of time a much larger staff was required for superintending and doing the work of the vessels generally, and thus the vessels must be much more expensive to work than vessels fitted with the cylindrical type of boiler. With regard to the experiments on the two ships referred to in the Memorandum, the "Highflyer" and the "Minerva," he found that there had been no less than fourteen defects in the "Highflyer" which had the Belleville type of boiler, whereas in the "Minerva," which had cylindrical boilers, there were only six defects. He believed that during the trials of sixty hours at a time, the "Minerva" had to be detained twice while the defects of the "Highflyer" were being repaired. In connection with the Report just issued there was one serious omission on the part of the Admiralty, no allusion being made to the great heat connected with working of this type of boiler. From reports which had been received from engineers and others it appeared that men in the stokehold were sometimes tiredly incapacitated for work. In climates, such as the Red Sea and other places, where the heat was great, extra had to be employed—Zanzibar men—were accustomed to work in great heat. He could prove what he had said regard to the great heat in the stokeholds of these boilers by calling attention to the fact that it was proposed to be done. It was proposed to introduce an eight-inch layer of silicate of cotton in order to cool the cabins habitable. In regard to the new yacht, he held that the Constructor of the Navy, instead of signing the vessel in the office of the Admiralty, ought, as any shipbuilder would have done in building a yacht for his own use, to have called in the assistance of a naval architect accustomed to the designing and building of yachts. This was perfectly evident from the construction of the "Victoria" and that the ability to build yachts must exist at the Admiralty. We had been told what the extra cost was of pulling that vessel to pieces.

THE CHAIRMAN: That question does not arise on this Vote. The fact that we are now discussing refers to a vessel which is built under contract for Her Majesty's Government.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY: The reason assigned for the adoption of this type of boiler was that it was less expensive than the cylindrical boiler. That was perfectly true. He believed that the difference in weight in favour of the Belleville boilers was 100 tons in point there was no information Memorandum which had been before them; but on page 26 of port they had the performances vessels with the Belleville type and four ships with cylindrical One of the vessels with Belleville type of boiler made a run from the Nore to Gibraltar, a distance of 1,330 miles. During the run she consumed 950 tons of coal, a cylindrical boiler ship, in a run of 1,330 miles, consumed only 569 tons of coal, supposing both of these vessels to be fitted with cylindrical boilers, a distance of 3,000 miles, they could have been, in regard to the consumption of something like 50 tons, while the consumption in the "Royal Arthur" would not amount to more than 1,500 tons—once of about 600 tons in favour of the Belleville type of boiler.

Mr. C. H. Wilson.

Highflyer" as compared with the ra." But what about the fuel?

It will be admitted that coal meant distance, and that a vessel which required 2,000 tons compared badly with a vessel which required 1,500 tons of coal for the same distance of 500 tons. On a voyage across the Atlantic the difference would be 500 tons. That was a most serious matter in connection with the Belleville type of boiler. In regard to this question of boiler the First Lord of the Admiralty said that the Admiralty said that the advantages of their vessels were not to be compared with those of the mercantile ships. Were our cruisers to be treated as if they were toys? These vessels, completed and ready for sea, ought to be on a continuous voyage of five, six, or seven days, in the same way as the mercantile ships, owned by large companies. We used a different method in regard to the mercantile trial system; but we would not arrive at a correct estimate of the power of our men-of-war until we adopted the same method. He came now to another point, that was the policy with regard to the strength of the Navy. The policy agreed by both parties in the State was to build a Navy of this country, both with respect to ships and guns, should be equal to the two other maritime Powers—Great Britain and Russia. That was the policy laid down by the late and the previous Government. Whether it was the policy of the present Government it was impossible to say.

In 1889 this country had 36 ships afloat and 15 building; 12 coast defence ships; 12 armoured cruisers; and 86 protected cruisers; whilst France and Russia in the same year had only 25 battleships afloat, and 12 building. At the end of 1899—ten years later—this country had only 34 battleships afloat, and 17 building—a total of 51; whilst France and Russia had 34 battleships afloat, and 16 building—a total of 50, or only one less than this country possessed. If our policy was to have two to one, it thus appeared that both with respect to battleships and cruisers we were considerably short of the number required. He believed that the men-of-war of other countries were fitted with electrical hoists for facilitating the rapid handling of munitions in time of war, and he could not see why similar facilities should not be provided on our ships. He hoped the Committee of Inquiry would be appointed quickly, and that the Admiralty would ascertain as early as possible all the facts in connection with the different types of boiler.

*SIR J. COLOMB: In view of the fact that the First Lord of the Admiralty has announced his intention of having a Committee, I do not wish to occupy the time of the House with any expression of my own opinion, except to say that I think it was absolutely inevitable that the water-tube principle should be adopted. The question of the suitability of the Belleville boiler, or any other type, is an open question, but I would like to have some definite information from the First Lord in regard to the producing power of this country. I think it is an extremely serious thing when we have adopted the principle of two to one. It is not a scientific standard. What is there to begin with? The Navy consists of several classes of vessels. You cannot lump the whole question, and say that if Russia and France—the two greatest maritime Powers next to us—have so many battleships and cruisers, therefore we can adjust scientifically the arrangements of our Fleet. But even taking this standard of two to one, to be told that we cannot complete our ships to attain our standard is a most serious position, because these ships were projected to keep up our strength to that standard. What is the use of having a standard if our arrangements for producing ships and engines are insufficient to keep up that standard itself? When the Navy Estimates were formerly before us I asked a question to which I did not get an answer; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will answer now. I wish to know what steps are being taken as regards the development of our producing power. I am not at all sure that our naval intelligence staff are observing as completely and efficiently as they ought to do what other Powers are doing. If other Powers are increasing their plant and arrangements for greater producing power, it would be interesting to know what we are doing in that direction. To my mind that is really the root of the whole question. I do not remember myself—I may be wrong—in the whole history of this country of its ever having been announced before in this House, that although ships are projected and necessary, we were not able to complete them. I am sure the Admiralty has done its best to push on these matters, but you cannot increase your producing power in a hurry. It is a matter of settled policy that requires a long time to develop, and if they have done all that they can it is not to be laid to the door of the Administration of this particular time that the position is not more satisfactory. It shows that there has been a continuous defect in carrying out the policy, and in making the necessary arrangements for developing the producing power. I will not go into the question of personnel now as I have a motion down to reduce the salary of the First Lord, and I will defer my remarks on that matter until the time comes to move. I have also a motion down to reduce the Vote in respect of £62,000 for subventions of the merchant service. I shall not move that, because we are in the midst of great transport operations, and I do not think it is opportunity to go into a question of policy which is now under test in a practical way, and as far as I know the present experience is justifying my persistent opposition to this subvention principle on its present lines.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton): I wish to call the attention of the Committee to another matter, and that is the attitude of the Admiralty towards the question of submarine or submersible boats. I can only ground my complaints upon answers which have been given across the floor of the House, and it is quite possible that it may be a matter of necessity that those answers should not be more explicit.

Sir J. Colmb.

The first answer is that of the First Lord of the Admiralty to the hon. Member for West Newington—

“The submarine boat, even if the difficulties attending its use can be overcome, seems so far as the immediate future is concerned, to be essentially a weapon for the Powers on the defensive, and it is not those nations which anticipate holding the position should endeavour to develop it.”

The second answer is one in reply to a question I put asking whether the Admiralty were conducting any experiments in regard to these submarine boats. The reply was that they were not doing so, but were watching the experiments of other nations. As far as we can judge from the attitude of the Admiralty is that they are not doing anything themselves in the way of experiments, but they are watching the experiments of others. I want to frankly to say that the point of view from which I approach this matter is that of the business man. I think that perhaps, Admiralty and naval matters are left rather too much to the discretion of experts and Members for naval contingencies. Who, after all, are the most interested in the Navy? The people who pay most for it, and they are the productive classes of the community. If I may number myself among them, I am the most interested, because we contribute so largely towards it, and we depend so much upon it. Who would suffer most if we lost the supremacy of the sea? In a material sense the productive classes of the community. Therefore it is the manufacturing classes who are most interested in the Navy being kept up to the highest possible point of efficiency. I want to look at the matter from the point of view of the plain business man, and I say from that point of view the attitude of the Admiralty is indefensible. I do not at all assume that there is anything in the scheme. I am quite prepared to grant, for the sake of argument, that ultimately it may be found that there is nothing in it. But that is not a sufficient reply. If you are conducting a great business—and there is no greater business than that of the Navy—you must not only be the first in production, you must also be the first in experimenting. In my own small way, if people about me are not experimenting when other people are experimenting, I blame them very considerably; I say they are neglecting their duty. You do not know what may come of experiments.

possible that the circumstances may not be hopeful or clear; also more than possible conducting these experiments and something which will be of use. Therefore, my comment to be answered by saying things will not succeed. My question: Are you taking up the position to take up as the head of business? Are you showing that energy and zeal and forwardness that is demanded by your position? Is there anything in this matter? Take the example of the First Lord himself. He might be useful to nations on the defensive. But that plan of dividing things into two categories—those on the defensive, and those on the offensive—is illogical. Take a nation like ours, spread all over the world; any war breaks out, we shall be in places on the offensive, but in some places also we shall be on the defensive. The matter will not be settled by the great naval Armageddon in which the great navies of the world will meet on the open sea and fight each other; only one is left. As we have in the present land war in South Africa, in some places we are superior, in some places we are inferior; therefore, that because on the whole we are on the defensive, and that other nations will be on the offensive with regard to us, does not prove that we should take every possible precaution to have every appliance that is useful for defence as well as for offence. I was astonished at the apparent underlying that answer, to say that we are the nation on the defensive, and that other nations are on the offensive, is a very partial and, if so, untrue view of the matter. In the idea anything that is of use in defence, there must be an usefulness of which we ought to take advantage. The First Lord of the Admiralty in the same answer said—“the question of the best way” is an acknowledgment that there is nothing in these boats—its attack is receiving much condemnation it is in this direction that practical precautions will be valuable.”

There is something in the attack; there would be no need of any fleet to meet that attack. You fear it;

you are giving your mind to considering how that attack should be met. Why are you not giving your mind to the consideration of the means of attack, as well as to the means of defence against that attack? There is another point to which I should like to call the attention of the Committee, and that is as to the course taken by other countries in reference to this matter. Is there anything in it at all? Is it a mere idle dream, or does there lie in it the germ of something useful? I think there does. The right hon. Gentleman referred in most eloquent terms to the lofty English scorn that some people show in regard to looking to foreign nations for examples. But anybody who has in the least degree studied the history of naval matters knows that France has been ahead of us in a great many things. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that in regard not only to breech-loading guns, but to armour plate, the application of steam to ships of war, and to rams—in all these things the French were ahead of us. Therefore, whenever the French do anything it behoves us to look at it seriously, because they have been pioneers in these matters, and anyone who reads the debates in the French House of Commons on naval questions knows in what detail and with what keenness these matters are discussed, not merely from the point of view of getting higher wages for some particular class of men, but from the point of view of general national and naval policy. I therefore contend that the example of France in this matter is deserving of the serious attention of the Admiralty and of the country. The French are not only not doubtful about the matter, but they are absolutely certain that there is something in this idea which is or may be made very valuable. They built in 1888 the “Gymnote,” the “Gustave Zédé” in 1893, the “Morse” in 1899, and the “Narval” in 1899. The “Narval” is under trial and is a success, realising up to a certain point the autonomous and offensive submarine. On the stocks are six submarines, all, it would seem, of the “Morse” type, and these are the “Français”—they are even named; this is no mere chimera, they have names—the “Français,” the “Algerien,” the “Korrigan,” the “Farfadet,” the “Gnome,” and the “Lutin.” Two improved “Narvals” are being built. I find also in the plan of the manœuvres, which are attracting so much attention now, that the submarines "Narval" and "Morse" will go through exercises, diving and reappearing on the surface, during the review. All this shows that in France this matter has got beyond the stage of a mere dream, and therefore I say that in England it has certainly reached a stage deserving experiment. There may be a certain amount of national excitability to which we are rather fond of thinking ourselves superior, but the French people have subscribed 300,000fr. to present one of these boats to the nation, and the French seven years programme includes the building of thirty-eight submarine boats. M. Lockroy, the Minister of Marine, has described most carefully the action of one of these submarine boats which sailed from Turin to Marseilles, and which in eight minutes practically sunk the "Magenta" ship. The Committee must remember that when you sink a battleship you sink forty to one in the way of value alone, because a battleship costs forty times as much as one of these boats. In the last parliamentary debate on the French Naval Estimates the Reporter of Navy Estimates said:—

"The submarine vessels are now proved to be so valuable that a large number should be at once provided."

But we are not confined to France. It is only to-day that we have heard that France and the United States were the two countries whose example was most to be looked to. What do the United States say? They too have taken up this matter. I am sorry to say I am old enough to remember how much depends upon being ahead in these matters. Some Members will remember when the "Merrimac" came out; it was a new development—a development we should have laughed at in this House and which the Admiralty would have thought not worth experimenting about. But it was an experiment which would have sunk the whole fleet of the Northern States if they had not had another experiment—the "Monitor." That departure has revolutionised naval warfare, and therefore there is something in these matters. There have appeared in our papers pictures of the Holland boat. It is not an experiment even in its early stages; it is worked out to the most minute nicety. You have an arrangement of electric motor power for travelling under the water; of gas power for searching; you get a speed of eight knots under the water, and of fifteen knots on the surface. I saw it stated that the United States intended to add fifty of these vessels to their fleet. The Naval Department of America has been considering this matter very carefully, and Admiral Dewey, who will be thought a mean authority, was consulted on the question. He appeared before the House of Representatives Committee on Naval Affairs when the subject was discussed. He told the Committee he had witnessed the test of the Holland boat and greatly admired its performance. He was convinced that if the Spaniards had two Holland boats in Manila they could never have remained there. Two nations that have been held up this afternoon by the First Lord of the Admiralty as the countries who eminently claim our attention are the two nations who are not experimenting in this matter but are actually building these boats. We should not dwell so much upon this matter, but it is not an occasion on the part of the Admiralty; it is an instance of a chronic disease. In these things we have always been behind, and we are going to be behind again. I do not say that nothing is certain to come out of the experiments, but what is that the present course of the Admiralty does not indicate that they are realising their duties as managers of a great business upon which the welfare and safety of a great nation depends. It is astounding that we are behind anyone in experimenting in any direction that may be of any light whatever upon any subject in this great business upon which so much depends. I do not mean to be an expert, but I think that the Admiralty are taking a wrong position in this matter. I would ask the Committee to consider the moral effect of always being in a business man I have learnt that it is merely the actual results of experiments that are of value, but people know that no one is ever satisfied with you, that you are always in the process of trying things, and this gives a feeling of hopefulness and that cannot be obtained in any other way. There is also the moral effect of building vessels themselves. I cannot say anything more weird, and more likely to strike fear into the hearts of your enemies than the gliding under water, which may at any time send them to the bottom. There is uncertainty, the invisibility, and the uselessness of the thing, which have a bad effect upon your opponents, probably far exceeding the effect actually done by the boat. I thank the right hon. Gentleman, who has such a spirit of patriotism and courage, that in this matter, as in other matters, he will see that the British Army and Navy are really in front of the nations of the world.

MR. PHILLPOTTS (Devonshire, Devon): Like many other hon. Members of the House I do not pretend to be able to give an authoritative opinion upon the question of water-tube boilers; that is a question to be threshed out by a committee of experts. But there is one point in connection with water-tube boilers upon which I do venture to offer an opinion, and that is the complement of the engine-room, and especially in regard to these engines.

We have only to read the Memorandum which has been supplied to the House that many of the accidents which have occurred have been due to want of care and to the lack of proper inspection and manipulation of these complicated engines.

When I tell the Committee that the complement of artificers on board of the "Highflyer" class is only 12, I think will be enough to show that that complement is not sufficient to carry out the important duties demanded from the engine-room staff. One hon. Member has told us that there were 48,000 joints in connection with these boilers and their machinery, with a steam pressure between 250 and 300 pounds to the square inch. That means that every artificer has over 5,300 joints with which to occupy his spare time. I say spare time, because he has to keep, and in addition to his work in the engine-room, the artificers and engineers have to look after the 12 engines, the electric light and the thousand and one other machines that exist on board Her Majesty's ships. I therefore assert, without hesitation, that there is not a single engineer or executive officer in the House who will say that the engine-room complement is anything like sufficient. I hope my right hon. friend will take immediate steps to remedy that deficiency. I am quite aware of the difficulty of engaging skilled artificers; but, after all, the question of engaging men of that class is more or less a matter of money; and I am quite certain that this Committee, if called upon, will ungrudgingly vote the necessary funds to provide additional or increased pay if such be demanded in order to get the proper number of men to attend to the work of the engines and boilers of these vessels. I am not referring to ships fitted with cylindrical boilers. Their complement is about the same, but the work is not nearly so hard, and the men have a much better chance of properly carrying out their duties. There are undoubtedly many great advantages in connection with water-tube boilers, most of which are pointed out in the Memorandum; but there is one advantage which may fairly be claimed for them which is not alluded to—namely, the fact of the machinery being below the water-line. Recently I had an opportunity of seeing the drawings of two ships of exactly the same class—the "Talbot" and the "Highflyer" class. The "Talbot" was a very successful ship, getting up her speed and doing her work most efficiently, but her cylinders are 4 feet above the water-line, and have to be protected by a steel dome; whereas in the ship of the same size of the "Highflyer" class they are all under one steel deck, which does not come above the water-line. Gentlemen who have experience only of mail steamers and passenger ships do not realise the difference of the conditions that prevail on board Her Majesty's ships. Several speakers have wondered why our fast cruisers cannot keep up their speed on a voyage across the Atlantic. They are never intended to do anything of the kind. They are designed and intended to keep up their high rate of speed for chasing, or, in emergency, avoiding an enemy. They are not intended to make a voyage at that speed, and it would be perfectly impossible with existing conditions to design a ship with all the necessary qualities of a man-of-war which could do such work. I will in a very few words endeavour to illustrate my meaning. Take the case of the "Terrible," a vessel of 14,000 tons, and the "Campania," one of the most successful of ocean mail steamers, of a slightly less tonnage. The length of the "Campania" is somewhere about 100 feet greater than that of the "Terrible";

her amidship section is very much less, and there is no necessity to keep her engines below the water-line, as they are not exposed to shell fire. It is perfectly evident to anyone who is acquainted with the operations of designing a ship that it is impossible to get the same speed in a short broad boat that you can in a long narrow one, unless you devote the whole space to the engines and boilers, and that obviously would be impossible in a man-of-war. We also hear a great deal about the expenditure of coal in connection with some of our men-of-war, but the fact is often lost sight of that an enormous amount of coal is expended in connection with the auxiliary engines, the engines for working the turrets, for electric lighting purposes, ventilating, and other matters. So far it has not been found possible to obviate the increased waste that occurs when steam leaves the boilers at a very high pressure, and a certain amount of the additional expenditure on water-tube boilers may be accounted for in that way. For my part, I believe that the boiler of the future will be some form of water-tube boiler, and I think that the results of the labours of this Committee which is to be appointed will be of the very greatest use to the country. I now turn to another subject. I notice in the Navy Estimates this year provision is made for the construction of several armoured and protected cruisers. I wish to draw the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to the armaments it is proposed to place on board those ships. Take the armaments of the armoured cruisers of 9,800 tons. I find that they consist of fourteen 6-inch guns, which is a very much lighter armament than would be placed upon a cruiser of anything like that tonnage built by any foreign Power. I find in the "Ariadne" class, which are vessels of 11,000 tons, the armament consists of sixteen 6-inch guns. I contend that that is a mistake. What is the use of designing your ships for coal-carrying capacity and a high rate of speed when, within range of the enemy, they may find themselves hopelessly outclassed? I am well aware that there are many persons whose opinion is worthy of the highest respect, who hold that these armaments are sufficient, and that nothing should be sacrificed in the shape of coal-carrying capacity in order to increase those armaments, and yet I venture to say that the mass of naval opinion, and the opinion of officers who will command of these ships, would be in favour of supplying them with greater power and calibre than the proposed armament. I would ask my hon. friend to consider this point: those vessels get too far advanced in their armour. Once the constraints so far advanced alterations can be made by a very great sacrifice of money, and material, and in the opinion of vast numbers of naval officers, it is essential that this matter should be considered before the vessels are so advanced. There is another point in connection with this subject of which would remind the Committee. Speaking broadly, the power of penetration of a gun is equal to about one and a half times its calibre. Therefore, a 6-inch gun would penetrate nine inches of armour, and a 9.2-inch gun would penetrate nearly fourteen inches of armour. We see from the reports not only of our own ironclads, but of the ironclads built by foreign nations, that they are unable to attain a speed of nineteen knots is easy to imagine that one of our heavy cruisers might be pursued by an enemy's battleship so near her speed that she might be placed in a very awkward position; where she carried a couple of 9.2-inch guns in a turret aft, it would not make all the difference between escape and capture. I beg to submit this suggestion to my right hon. friend, and hope that he will give it his further consideration. I now come to the question of the experiments of the "Bellevue." I have read some of the criticisms and accounts of those experiments which appeared in the public press. As to some people's ideas one would think that it was supposed that any ship ever had been designed could be kept afloat after being subjected to the fire which was opened upon the "Bellevue." I venture to say that there is no ship either designed or built that would have remained afloat subject to the actions as prevailed on the occasion which I refer to. If the "Bellevue" had not been sunk it would have been one of two things—either that it would have been absolutely useless, or that our gunners would have been more than useless. With regard to the question of fire between decks on board ships, I think it has been much exaggerated.

to see the result of those fires, because it was quite neglected. The danger has been overrated. I have never seen between decks on board a ship and I have only seen six fires, and only two of those were in the case of a fire on board. The danger is in regard to the fact that there is not sufficient material between decks on board a man-of-war for action to make sufficient of a source of danger. I am certain that, providing there were a crew left alive after being in a murderous fire that would occur in a naval action, it occurred it could easily be avoided. There is also the question of the lower decks. The last portion of the ship that burns is her deck. I recollect the occasion of a fire on board a ship which had been smouldering for some time before it was discovered. Part of the lower decks were charred through, and finding it was like going over thin plates, nevertheless, by doing so we were able to save the ship, whereas if it had been an iron deck we would not have been able to walk on it on the heat, and the vessel would have been lost. It has been proved, even in the case of ships, that the deck is about the last portion of the ship to burn. In the other case of a fire I ever saw was on the Bombay, and in this case the guns on the ship were loaded and the fire broke out. Some minutes or half an hour after it had been driven out of the ship by the flames and smoke, these guns were found and it was a plain proof from the position of the shots that the deck of the ship was intact at the time. That I think, that the deck does not burn so readily as the parts of the ship which are upright. That view was borne out by the other fire on board ship where the fire went off after the crew had all perished, and a number of men were on a ship which was moored.

Therefore I think it is clear that the danger of fire between decks has been much overrated. The hon. Member for Bolton has referred to the danger of submarine boats, but that is a different story. Submarine boats have not been invented with now for nearly 50 years. I remember that some of the boats were made with a submarine boat in Valparaiso Harbour. It was a perfect submarine boat, for it went down and has not come up since. No doubt something may be done in this direction, and something may be learned, and I am glad that the Admiralty are turning their attention to this matter.

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): The leader of the Opposition has given expression to the satisfaction felt in all quarters of the House at the promise of a Committee. So that there is no need for me to say more upon that point. There is one phrase used by my right hon. friend with respect to the officials at the Admiralty which I, as an old member of the Admiralty, may be allowed to emphasise. It is that I cordially hope there will be no feelings of regret, or any notion that an aspersion is cast upon anybody, at the Admiralty, by the appointment of this Committee. No doubt the House has read with a good deal of interest the very frank admission which is made in the Memorandum of the defects which have occurred in the ships both in regard to boilers and engines. I think this Committee will meet the undoubted uneasiness which exists in the minds of many people in this country upon this subject, and the Committee is not intended in any sense as a reflection upon the Admiralty at large, and certainly not upon the Engineer-in-chief, Sir John Durston, who has borne such a heavy responsibility and taken such a bold step in advising the Admiralty to adopt water-tube boilers. Perhaps I may be allowed to say that I think there has been a somewhat ungracious response, at all events on the part of one or two Members on the other side of the House, to this announcement of the First Lord of the Admiralty. On this side of the House I think I may claim that his remarks have been received in a more gracious spirit. The hon. Member for the Shipley division and the hon. Member for King's Lynn did not seem to accept graciously the answer of the right hon. gentleman in regard to the Belleville boilers.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The right hon. Gentleman has no right to say that, for I accepted it most graciously.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: There are some very important and serious matters for this Committee to inquire into, and amongst them I will only refer to two. After all, it does seem to me that it is somewhat a beating of the air and a waste of the valuable time of this House at this stage of the session to enter into any full debate upon the subject of water-tube boilers, for the consideration of which, this Committee has been appointed. I think hon. Members who came down prepared to deliver speeches on the subject of water-tube boilers may very well put their notes in their pockets, as I intend to do, and leave the subject to be thoroughly threshed out by the Committee. I do hope that great attention will be paid to what the First Lord of the Admiralty very truly called a very important part of the subject—namely, the human element. All the speakers who have spoken with knowledge upon this subject to-day have dealt with the human element. It is a fact which is known to those who have paid close attention to this subject that, in some of the ships in our Navy and in many foreign ships where these very boilers have been used, the difficulties have been overcome, and it does seem to me that if the human element is after all the greatest difficulty in the matter, the most important problem to solve is the training of the human element that has so much to do with these water-tube boilers. The personnel of our engine-room and stoke-hole contingents seems to be a very important matter for consideration. There is another point which I will only just mention. First of all let me say that I entirely agree that neither the present Board of Admiralty nor its predecessor is pledged to any particular type of water-tube boilers. It was decided some years ago that water-tube boilers should be applied not only to torpedo destroyers but to big ships, and the only available water-tube boiler was the Belleville boiler. I particularly wish to put in that preface before saying what I am about to say. I remember very well that my hon. friend the Member for Lewisham stated in a speech, a year ago, that the water-tube boiler had come to stay. I think that is the general opinion of persons in this House and outside. So far as the navies of the world, and our own Navy in particular, are concerned, I adopt the phrase of my hon.

friend that the water-tube boiler has come to stay. I do not think that with an intelligent acquaintance with the subject, who considers the question without prejudice and without partiality for the old cylindrical boiler, we have come to any different conclusion. There is no reason on that point why we should be wedded to the Belleville boiler. But, having adopted this French invention, I think the House will agree with me that we should gather all the light we can from the advances which have been made in France and other countries, and I think we should also to avail ourselves of all the experience which has been gained by the inventor and his firm. The fact is, perhaps known to some Members of the House that a gentleman who occupied long ago the position of Director of Dockyards, who stands very high among the naval constructors of this country, has lately paid a visit to France upon this subject in order to satisfy himself upon this point, about which he felt some anxiety, and he went to investigate the defects arising from or connected with the boilers and engines in ships fitted with Belleville boilers. The result of the inquiries has been satisfactory. I think we should send representatives over to Paris to have personal interviews with Mr. Belleville and ascertain what has been done in Paris. I understand that Mr. Belleville will be pleased for anyone from the Admiralty or the Navy to be placed in possession of the full knowledge he possesses on the subject. We have for years paid large royalties for the use of this invention. Therefore we have a claim upon Mr. Belleville, who ought to be willing to afford us the fullest information with respect to the way in which these difficulties have been overcome in France for example as regards the little contrivances which have been adopted in getting over many of the difficulties in connection with the corrosion of tubes, leakage of joints, and the excessive consumption of coal in Belleville boilers. I venture to suggest that this Committee should visit Paris, and should ascertain from Mr. Belleville himself all the experience he can give upon this subject. The reputation of his invention is at stake; he will be willing to give full information. Passing from the subject of these water-tube boilers, I want to ask just one stions with regard to the addition we have before us. My question is with respect to the purchase of destroyers. I have very little to say, as regards the "Viper's" vessel, fitted with the steam turbine, this is a very wise purchase on the part of the Admiralty. But, as the rest, I observe that they cost more than £70,000 each, and I should like to have a few particulars about them. I like to know what is their speed. The First Lord of the Admiralty told us that negotiations were going on at the present time of the financial year in regard to these destroyers, and I am sure I shall be ready to give the House fuller information on the subject. With regard to repairing ships I should like to know what it will have. I do not object to further repairing ships, and I do not say a word of criticism to say against the proposal. I do not propose to detain the House any longer, although I was prepared to say more upon the water-tube question had it not been for the opinion of the First Lord of the Admiralty.

ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, will endeavour to act upon the opinion of the right hon. Baronet who has spoken down in regard to the discussion of water-tube boilers, although I was prepared to go into the question at length. I think that is only a reasonable course out of the statement made by the First Lord of the Admiralty concerning them. I shall certainly take the opinion of the right hon. Baronet, and I am sure he will not find me wanting in opinion of the concession which the First Lord of the Admiralty has made in setting up this Committee. The decision of the First Lord has arrived at seems to be eminently in the public interest. It is perhaps more acceptable because, like many others, I have for many years been urging upon the Government that some inquiry of this kind should be granted in order to set at rest doubts which have affected some of the merits or demerits of the Belleville boiler. I certainly claim for myself that until very recently I have not expressed, because I never felt justified in expressing any very strong opinion about these boilers, but I have always said that there has been an amount of doubt about them which was calculated to make one feel uneasy. Therefore I welcome the appointment of this Committee. I do not share the view which is held by the hon. Member for Gateshead, who seems actually to desire that these boilers should be condemned. That is not my view, for no one would rejoice more than I should if this Committee which is to be appointed should report absolutely in favour of these boilers to which the Navy is so largely committed. The right hon. Gentleman must feel that the doubt which has hitherto existed in regard to this experiment has been enormously increased by the publication of this Report. I have seen these boilers fitted, I have seen them under trial, and I have done my best to acquaint myself with their performances, and this Report does not come altogether as a surprise to me. But it is an official confirmation of what many of us have been feeling—namely, that we are committed to an experiment of so great a magnitude that it is not tolerable that we should continue it any longer in this condition of doubt. There is ample justification for an inquiry in the fact that there are forty millions sterling embarked in sixty-one ships, and much more than forty millions, because there is also the whole safety of the Navy, and behind that the safety of the nation. Now we have an admission—ample, official, undoubted—that the whole of this expenditure is at this moment dependent on a series of experiments. The Admiralty are sanguine as to the ultimate result of these experiments. I am most anxious to share that sanguine view, and I should be rejoiced if it is justified by the result; but I do not think it is possible that the country should be longer asked to subscribe to this expenditure until we are absolutely sure of what we are being committed to. I think I shall not be trespassing on the advice given me by my right hon. friend opposite if I say one word with regard to the work which I hope the Committee about to be appointed may do. Nothing has struck me more in reading this Report than the curiously unscientific character of the experiments which have been made. I hear and see something now and then of scientific work, and of scientific experiments. We know that qualitative and quantitative experiments are now performed with a perfection and accuracy that guarantees almost perfect results. But in experiments no single trial has been made which would be regarded in a laboratory as worthy of being called a test at all. The ships which have been tried have not been the same in any sense. In these days the advantage is with the newer ship; but in the very first experiment that presumption is reversed, because we are told in the Memorandum that the advantage was with the "Minerva," with her trained crew, as against the "Highflyer," although the two ships were three or four years apart in date. That is not the way to make experiments. We want two ships of the same class, under the same conditions, and with equal crews. I do not think the hon. Member for Gateshead challenged the honesty and good faith of the Admiralty officials, but I think he was justified in pointing out that some forty or fifty tons of water were carried in the tanks of the "Highflyer," whereas that fact is not revealed in the Report before us. That is a very relevant fact indeed, because it so happens that an almost equal number of tons is quoted in another part of the Report as the weight which would enable one of the cylindrical boiler ships to produce the same horse-power if put in the form of machinery. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman was thoroughly justified in calling attention to that fact. Not in one single case in the trials between those two ships can the experiments be called scientific. The "Ocean" has been quoted. The "Ocean" is a recently constructed ship, and presumably has in her machinery every single appliance that the most modern science could supply. She was designed especially for speed, being the fastest of the ironclads produced up to the present time, and the design has been realised. But, as my hon. friend opposite said, speed is not a matter of boilers, but of a variety of causes, and it is slightly misleading, when we are told that the "Ocean" did exactly what she was designed for, because that is not conclusive as regards her boilers. The argument of the First Lord is that these ships are so dissimilar in their results that it is as unfair to judge from one single trial of an unsuccessful ship as it would be to judge from one trial of a successful ship.

MR. GOSCHEN: We cannot have two ships exactly alike, launched and commissioned on the very same days, and exactly of the same dimensions; but we have done our best, and we have two ships as similar as we could get. Now we are told that the experiments have been unscientific because we have been unable to realise conditions in which no human power could possibly interfere. We have done our very best.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Of course I was not challenging the bona fides of the Admiralty, but I think it is permissible when we are asked to take conclusions from a number of trials to criticise the trials and to point out that they could not be regarded as conclusive. I never ventured to suggest to the chief of the engineering staff of the Admiralty that a trial should be made on an extensive scale and that two vessels like the "Duke" and "Edgar" should be sent on a long troping voyage, where all the chances of the sea might be encountered over a long series of days. I suggested the "Edgar" because she is the finest example of a ship that could be got of the cylindrical boiler of large dimensions. My proposal was not adopted. The right hon. Gentleman says, and it is perfectly true, that it is very difficult to make these comparisons. All I mean to say is that if that be so we must regard all the conclusions as approximate only, and that an element of uncertainty must enter into every one of them. There is another matter in the Report to which I wish to refer. In the concluding paragraph we are told that had it not been for the courage of the Admiralty in introducing the Belleville boiler into the "Powerful" and the "Terrible," when they did, sixty-one ships which are enumerated in the Report as built or to be built would have at least a knot less speed than they now have or will have. That is an illusory statement. Many ships have been built, or are now under construction, both in this country and abroad, which have or will have a superior speed, and yet have not or will not have Belleville boilers. I think cannot be too well understood that it was not necessary that the Belleville boilers should have been introduced in order to obtain this extra amount of speed. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman, who no doubt dealt broadly with the matter, has, I think, been the cause of a little confusion. As the hon. Member for King's Lynn pointed out, the impression created when the right hon.

That is not the or three years I have been study- question, and I have taken as part as was permitted me in these ns, and I think I have some know- the facts. The right hon. Gentle- oted the French Mediterranean n, and spoke about that splendid t I do not think he made it quite the Committee that of that great e of the finest vessels had not e boilers. I only desire to the impression that the great Mediterranean Squadron is an to us of how the Belleville boiler s extra speed. I ought to add many, with one single exception, adopted the Belleville boiler, United States has not adopted it nd that in the Dutch fleet a very ble experiment has been made in the ships by adopting a kind of d water-tube and cylinder boiler. e I think I am justified in saying on. I think, with many other mbers, that the persistency with e senior officials of the Admiralty d to the advantages of the Belle- er is a matter which ought to have eight, and it is a presumption es require very strong evidence it. I should like to refer to a mentioned by the hon. Member on, because I think it requires more than a passing notice, and that is the question of submarine boats. This is clearly a case which might have been dealt with as a technical matter, and if the First Lord had come down to this House and said that in the opinion of the engineering advisers of the Admiralty the accomplishment of the mechanical problem of making and working a submarine boat was so remote that there was no reasonable probability that such a boat could be created, and that, therefore, we had no reason for action, I should have been very slow to contradict him, because on that matter I am not competent to form an opinion which could be set beside the opinion of the engineers of the Admiralty. But that is not the line taken by the First Lord. He put the question on a footing which enables every Member of this House to form a judgment on it. He said that the Admiralty had not designed a submarine boat, and did not at present propose to design one, because a submarine boat was the weapon of the inferior Power. When he said that he reduced the whole question to a plain issue which plain men can discuss. If a submarine boat is impossible there is nothing more to be said, but if it can be produced as a working article—and that it can be produced I have no doubt whatever—then this argument about the weapon of the inferior Power seems absolutely meaningless. The Power which possesses the submarine boat will no longer be the inferior Power. The Power which possesses a really effective submarine boat, especially in the narrow waters of the Channel, will not be the inferior, but the superior Power, and the mere statement that we consider ourselves to be the superior Power will not affect the position. I was at Spithead the other day and saw one of our great battleships there, and I could not help asking myself what would happen if one of these French plunging boats were to approach that vessel in the dawn of the early morning. I saw absolutely nothing known to man which could save that ironclad in such a case. I am assuming that the probability of submarine navigation has been solved, and that these submarines, or plongeurs, can be made. I do not think that is a very great assumption when we see a body like the United States Navy Department, I suppose the most practical navy Department in the world except our own, devoting a large part of their energy and large sums of money to working out this problem. I say it is not altogether improbable to imagine that a solution will be found, and when once the problem is solved, there will be no protection except that offered by a torpedo-net, and that is a protection which every naval man would be reluctant to adopt; because, if it were adopted, it would absolutely paralyse the ship as an effective force in a naval action. If the danger is so easily guarded against as the right hon. Gentleman seems to think, and if we may rest secure without producing these boats ourselves, well and good, and I am delighted to hear it, but I say that the Power which possesses this engine will cease to be the inferior Power and will become the superior Power. We, beyond all nations, are exposed to the attacks of these boats. Everyone who knows the Channel must realise how absurdly small and narrow it is. It is like a navigable inland lake, and you no sooner leave one side than you are at the other. There is one classical instance of the use of the submarine boat, and that was during the civil war in the United States. Three times the boat sank with her crew, and three times a fresh crew was got, and ultimately she achieved her task and sank one of the Federal ships. That was at a time when the mechanical appliances in connection with ship construction were as nothing compared with those of the present day, and I submit it is not satisfactory that we should stand by and allow others to carry out this problem without our making some attempt to solve it. The right hon. Gentleman referred—as I thought, not very apropos of his argument—to the tendency of the Admiralty to follow not to lead other great nations. I admit that that has been the tendency, and from it I draw a lesson not very comforting in this particular case. It has been mentioned that in ironclad ships we have been behind, and have been compelled to follow, that in the matter of breechloading guns we have been behind, and have been compelled to follow, and that in the matter of armoured cruisers we have been behind, and have been compelled to follow at a terrible disadvantage. The fact is that not once or twice but several times we have been compelled to follow. It may be said, "Oh, but we gained a great advantage in all these cases by not taking the lead." I heard that argument put in a more striking form in the other House.

Mr. Arnold-Forster.

It was admitted that there was a failure to place guns at Singapore for many years; but that failure was regarded as a great triumph of foresight, because it was said that if the guns had been placed there fourteen years ago they would have been obsolete now, and that was due as a triumph of foresight. I hope in these days we may not follow a similar path too late. Our lesson with regard to ironclads, the breechloaders, and the armoured cruisers is exactly the same lesson which the Austrian army learned in 1866 when they were compelled to learn the merits of the breechloader by studying its effects on the field of battle. I think there is room for some misgiving with regard to the attitude taken with reference to submarine navigation.

*MR. MATHER (Lancashire, Wigan): I am glad to be able to say that this Memorandum appears to me to have been conceived in the most坦率 desire to state the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth as regards the experience of the Admiralty in connection with the new ships fitted with water-tube boilers. As an engineer with considerable experience of boilers in various parts of the world, I venture to say that the water-tube boiler is theoretically and practically correct. For myself I would like to see this country leading foreign ships instead of being led; and it is the duty of the Government and the patriotic duty of the Government to allow this country to experiment continually with the discoveries of science and see if they may be adapted to our use. I do not consider that there is any fault in this Memorandum to convince the House or the country that water-tube boilers, even of the Belleville type, have failed, although they have been used under circumstances not the most favourable for their development. I have only one comment to make from my experience as a practical engineer upon the Admiralty's action, or their methods in endeavouring to ascertain what type of boiler was worthy of their attention, or suitable for adaptation to the Navy. I think the experience required before placing these boats on the sixty of our first-class ships might have been thoroughly attained if they had built one ship, and fitted it with a water-tube boiler which was intended to be the basis of the system. In the ordinary course of scientific engineering it is when you have faith in a new principle or in a new adaptation of an old principle, to place upon one trial those conditions which will in a very short space of time compress an amount of strain and stress for which, in the ordinary course, a considerable number of years would be required. I cannot understand why one boiler was not supplied with water-tube boilers of the best design and of the best workmanship, and sent for a whole year's cruise all over the world with a first-class staff on board, and accompanied by practical men, for the purpose of learning anything by which the country might have been saved hundreds and thousands of pounds. I find on page 14 of the Memorandum what are called "general observations," in which some excuse is offered to the House for a certain want of competency on the part of the personnel of the staffs of these ships, and also a want of a calculation of the peculiarities of these boilers. It would seem that the staff were so much occupied with the imperfect trials of many ships at the same time that they were over-taxed. But naturally in order to arrive at the truth which experience can give in the quickest possible way, the rational thing would have been for the Admiralty to have taken one ship and condensed into one year the experience of four or five. Now we are told that we must not expect that all the weaknesses of these boilers would be discovered in four or five years. But the Admiralty ought to have created possible weaknesses in one ship for the purpose of dealing exhaustively with them. In this way they would have discovered innumerable details which appeared in the ships which were subsequently tried, and the tax upon the staff would have been greatly diminished. Scientifically, small water-tubes are much better than larger water-tubes for the purpose of generating steam; and what is scientifically and theoretically right cannot be practically wrong. It used to be said that a thing might be right in theory but wrong in practice. Now we know that what is theoretically right only needs human ingenuity to make it right in practice also. I maintain that this Memorandum does not do justice even to the Admiralty themselves. I am struck with the singular, almost innocent, ingenuousness of the confessions made here. There are many matters mentioned in detail that need not have been brought before this House, because they are the common events that occur in working machinery of every kind. But it appears to me that the whole scheme of machinery and apparatus throughout the ships is eminently a source of very great alarm. I am led to believe, from a study of this Memorandum, that there is something very radically wrong in designing the details of the system of the machinery on board the ships of war, or that the work is let to contractors under conditions that do not admit of that work being executed in the most perfect way possible. I will not call it cheese-paring; but there is some mistaken policy on the part of the Admiralty, or some lack in the discharge of duty. I cannot believe that this complaint would lie at the door of any contractor in this country worthy of being entrusted with the construction of a ship of war. I hope the Committee will not confine itself solely to the question of water-tube boilers. That is a matter which will settle itself in due course. What is more serious than water-tube boilers are the statements made in this Memorandum, leading us to believe that throughout the whole engineering practice of the Admiralty there is something radically wrong in not providing more efficient apparatus to meet the stress and strain of high pressure. The First Lord spoke of a pressure of 200 lbs. or 300 lbs. as something very high; but we are accustomed to that in land work, and provision has to be made that the steam pipes do not leak, and that the valves and other accessories do not give way. All that should be based on principles and practice perfectly well known, and which are, in fact, the commonplaces of engineering science. This Memorandum—drafted, I presume, by the First Lord's official advisers—has been prepared with a candour which is beyond all praise. There never has been a document presented to Parliament more transparently honest, or drawn up with a more sincere desire to be absolutely truthful. I may overestimate the gravity of the words used, but I do feel uneasy on the point, that there are throughout the ships and the apparatus on board them here described, a certain weakness and certain defects running throughout the whole arrangements which demand the most earnest attention of the engineering staff of the Admiralty, and which will call for the attention of the Committee to be appointed. One of the explanations which the First Lord gave as to the difficulty of maintaining these ships at a constant speed throughout the length of their voyages was the long range of steam pipes passing from the boiler-room right through the ship to auxiliary engines, etc. It was, he said, very difficult to keep these pipes tight on account of the vibration of the ship, especially with steam at a pressure of 300lbs. But is it absolutely beyond the power of the Admiralty to provide another means of transmitting power? Why, we have been passing Bills in this House for transmitting electrical current for power for miles and miles on land; and there is less difficulty in doing so on board ship. The motors and other mechanical appliances for transmitting the electrical power could easily be established in a central station near the chief engines and boilers, and all steam pipes avoided. If I understand the right hon. Gentleman aright, I am very distrustful of the attention paid by the engineering staff to what is called the subordinate positions. There is no country in the world containing a greater amount of genius in the chief constructors and the higher engineering staff than our own, but we have not got the great army of young men coming out of the schools able to take up the control of scientific details in subordinate positions. As "all roads lead to Rome," so if once we provided good scientific education, the Government would be provided with a large number of highly trained young men who would be forthcoming to take charge of every detail in our ships. We must remember that it is not the large but the small things in these ships which make for success. It is the greatness of the little. It is the want of vigilance in the smallest detail out of sight of the chief engineer and the captain which leads to disaster. I do hope the First Lord will take these matters into consideration. We want our Navy to be stronger year after year. We want it to be the chief defence of our country and the Empire, and we do not care what money is spent upon it. But we want the best equipment and the services of scientifically trained young men, ready to face every scientific development, including water-tube boilers. Under such circumstances we need not fear that our Navy will be unworthy of the country of which we are all so proud.

Mr. Mather.

MR. JOHN PENN (Lewisham): One who asked for the appointment of a Committee to investigate the subject of water-tube boilers, I seize this opportunity of thanking the Admiralty for taking a step which I believe will be a very great advantage to the public service. There is, however, one point I want to make. I understand that the Committee will deal only with the question of water-tube boilers. I venture to ask, if I may not be considered a bore, that the reference should be extended so as to include the engineering complement within the scope of the inquiry. And for this reason, that whatever form of water-tube boiler is adopted in the service, it is fairly obvious that the water-tube boiler will take a larger amount of attention than the cylindrical boiler, because of the larger number of mechanical accessories. This should be borne in mind by the Committee in making their investigation. The right hon. Baronet the late Secretary to the Admiralty raised a point as to the Belleville Company being located in France; and he was anxious that there should be larger conferences with the authorities in France. I want to be independent of the Belleville Company. I am not one of those who think that we are dependent on ideas in Paris. Besides, this running over to Paris for ideas might come under the doctrine of contraband of war. I have more faith than the Admiralty in the engineering talent of our own country. In these debates we hear of the extraordinary performances of the ships of the mercantile marine. It is quite true that some of these ships can keep up a speed of 20 knots an hour, but I would like them to be handed over to the engineers in our dockyards and run at full power. I doubt whether a very large margin over 20 knots would then be found. I again thank the Admiralty for granting this Committee.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): This discussion has raised a subject of great importance, and I am not going to add one unnecessary word to what has been said about the Belleville boilers. It devolved on me to bear the first brunt of the attack on these boilers five years ago from the hon. Member for Gateshead. I should like to associate myself with what has been said as to the course taken by the Admiralty. I thoroughly approve

Welcome the concessions made by the Lord. I entirely believe in the four of the Memorandum laid on the table, and I thank him for having fulfilled the suggestions I made to three weeks ago. I think the discussions on the Belleville boiler may well after the announcement made by the First Lord, and I hope that the inquiry will be useful. I understand that nothing has been said on another technical point on which the First Lord has made any announcement—that is in regard to submarine boats in other countries. I daresay the First Lord will tell us what is the deliberate view of the Admiralty on that subject after consideration of five years. In the time of the old Board I do not think it was very desirable to get a hearing on the matter; but the question has developed enormously since both in France and America. I think the House and the country have a right to know what the First Lord, advised as he is by the best expert evidence, thinks is the true policy to be pursued by this country. One other word of entirely general interest. Not a single remark has been made to-night so far as I know about the alarming growth of this Vote. This is the master Vote of the Navy Estimates; it controls all other Votes; and if it is increased all the other Votes must necessarily be increased, and yet not one word has been said on either side of the House about the tremendous prospect opened out to us. Let me read one or two figures. Eleven years ago the Shipbuilding Vote stood at £4,300,000 in a total Navy Estimate of £13,000,000—or in a normal year when there was no particular fluctuation, a proportion of four to thirteen. In 1894-5 the Shipbuilding Vote had increased to £7,300,000—or nearly double out of a total Navy Estimate of £18,400,000. Where are we now? I am taking no account of the additional Estimates which the First Lord will lay on the Table by and by; but this year the Shipbuilding Vote is £13,100,000, very near the total Navy Estimate of 1888-9; and the total Navy Estimate this year has reached the alarming figure of £28,500,000, although that is not by any means so large as it must become through the natural consequences of the Shipbuilding Vote. If we had the same numerical proportion as we had in normal times, we should have in ten years, even if not a penny were added to the Shipbuilding Vote, a total Navy Estimate of £40,000,000. No one can, at the present moment, gain any sort of popularity by calling attention to this enormous expenditure; indeed he may possibly suffer personal damage in doing so. But surely those responsible, however strongly they may believe in the necessity of a powerful Navy, should have the courage to point out to the people the enormity of the expenditure now reached, and the prospect of a still greater expenditure to be reached in future. There is only one other point I desire to refer to, and that is that the benefit of the thirty millions sterling we are now spending on the Navy accrues as much to our self-governing colonies as it does to Ireland or Scotland. Ireland and Scotland stand to the United Kingdom numerically in about the same proportion as Australia and Canada, and yet Australia and Canada do not contribute one farthing towards the Imperial naval expenditure. The only people who have proposed to pay a scintilla of its great obligation towards naval expenditure is the despised minority of Cape Colony. I venture to say that at the present moment, having regard to the state of our colonies and their feelings towards us, it would not be inopportune to suggest to them that they are rich, richer than many of those who have to contribute towards the naval expenditure in this country, and that they should contribute. Why should Australia have a free Navy provided for it at the expense of the poorest washerwoman in Ireland or Scotland? For every million we are voting to-night another quarter of a million will be required, and it is only right that our colonies should contribute to our naval expenditure.

*MR. DAVID MACIVER (Liverpool, Kirkdale) said he did not propose to follow the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, but to come back to the question of the water-tube boilers. As a shipowner of some experience he might say that water-tube boilers had both advantages and disadvantages, and if we were wrong using them in our Navy other countries who had followed our lead in this matter were also wrong, so that there need be no alarm in the matter. In this regard he was, however, bound to except two countries. The United States of America had not blindly followed our lead in this matter, and our German friends did not rely upon the water-tube boilers altogether, and in their later and newer vessels were placing boilers of both kinds. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had rather disarmed criticism by suggesting the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the matter, and although he (Mr. MacIver) felt a great deal of sympathy with him, he was not much in favour of this Committee. He did not think this Committee would discover anything further than would be ascertained by spending a few days at Newhaven or Dieppe. He thought we should endeavour to obtain information as to the merits and the demerits of the Belleville boilers wherever we could. The Great Western Railway, with which he was connected, possessed several steamers, and a short time previously he inquired of the marine superintendent as to the working of these boilers. That gentleman had previously been in the service of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, whose steamers, with those of the Chemin de Fer de l'Ouest, worked the service with Dieppe, and informed him that the Belleville boilers ran for about a fortnight and then that the French steamers so fitted were laid up for some six or seven weeks, whilst the other form of boilers gave no trouble whatever. The Belleville boilers had had a most exhaustive trial in the British mercantile marine, and had been discarded. They were a constant source of trouble, and did not appear to have the advantages that were claimed for them, and, except in the case of one shipping company, there was no one of any importance connected with the mercantile marine who had persevered with water-tube boilers of any kind. Those who were engaged in the shipping trade were not all fools, but men who understood their business, and had these boilers possessed any of the advantages which were claimed for them they would be found in the mercantile marine; but, except in the steamers of his hon. friend the Member for Hull, there was hardly a water-tube boiler of any kind in any trading steamship in the country. He wished to qualify his remarks by saying that, although he did not believe in the Belleville boiler in the slightest, he did thoroughly believe in the First Lord of the Admiralty, who had given his best attention to the subject, there was anything wrong in the matter, the right hon. Gentleman was not to be blamed, but the professional advice which he had been assisted, and this was also true as regarded the Secretary of the Admiralty and the Junior Lord. One thing was beyond dispute; in many points the Navy did not, as regards much of its everyday work, differ materially from the mercantile marine, and if in the experience of the mercantile marine these boilers had proved to be what they were said to be, they would not have been discarded as they had been. But in the mercantile service they had proved to be of no use at all. He had not the slightest doubt that for many purposes water-tube boilers were the right thing—for destroyers and for small vessels, for instance, but when it came to vessels of considerable size into which forty boilers had to be put, then there were 48,000 different things to look after; it was almost impossible for human beings to successfully do. He had no doubt that the Committee offered by the hon. Gentleman would be a useful one, but the constitution of it would be a difficult matter. They ought not to put gentlemen upon it who looked for obtaining work from the Admiralty. There were gentlemen in the House representing constituencies who were building for the Government who were carrying on, and these also should be included. Had he represented Birkenhead he might not have spoken so freely because his former constituents were for the Admiralty; but now he was free of such ties. There were other ships in the House who could speak as to the matter, and he hoped that great care would be taken in the constitution of the Committee.

MR. GOSCHEN: I quite admit that the constitution of the Committee is a very difficult matter, but I trust that we may be able to satisfy the public. At the same time I would like to give one vote to the House. Almost everyone who has spoken, while accepting the Committee and expressing satisfaction at its appointment, seemed to wish to express inquiry further and further in arrangements of the Admiralty. I want to see myself is a technical Committee which can practically deal with the questions before them, and which would not be tempted by the consideration of any side issue to delay dealing with the subject upon which the public most desires their decision. It is that reason that I wish to have practical men and men able to see those things at work. There is one point upon which I did not lay sufficient emphasis, and that is the question of the Niclausse versus Belleville boiler which has been raised. I wish to say that the Admiralty are not wedded to the Belleville boiler, but, as a matter of fact, we are going to introduce the Niclausse boiler in ships. I am only dealing with the question that the water-tube system is itself wrong. It is true—and this I told the Committee to understand—that though the Niclausse boiler differs from the Belleville in important technical particulars, it does not differ from it in the general principle. The Niclausse boiler is almost the same as the Belleville boiler, except that when required you can take out the whole of the tubes, which you cannot do in the Belleville boiler. It is in these small technical improvements that it is so much better than the Belleville boiler. I am afraid that I cannot gratify the natural curiosity that is felt in regard to that matter. The hon. Member said that we ought to make experiments, and at the same time he pointed out the enormous importance of submarine boats. If we are to make experiments we are not going to disclose the results, which we believe might rebound more to the advantage of our competitors than ourselves. If we are to induce shipbuilders to put their mind into the building of submarine boats, we must not make known what has been done to nations which might have the greatest use for these boats. I do not propose publicly to declare whether the Admiralty believe in submarine boats or not. I must ask the House to excuse me. Of course we do not wish to encourage or discourage other nations by stating, as hon. Members wish us to state, how great would be the danger of these submarine boats to ourselves. The House will allow me to be extremely reticent on the subject. My hon. friend said these boats would be easily able to threaten battleships in our dockyards on this side of the Channel. I must add one observation—that we do not neglect submarine boats. We know all about them. We take care that we inform ourselves of every experiment, and endeavour to ascertain the details of every boat introduced; and if we do not make the experiments ourselves, the experiments of other countries are useful to us. The right hon. Gentleman also asked me with regard to the destroyers which we purchased. They are not more expensive than those we have built. I need only say that the cost is about £50,000, the same as we pay for other destroyers, and that they are of the best and newest class of thirty knots. I think the House will feel that this debate has extended long enough.

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): I do not desire to prolong the discussion of the subject now before the House, but I wish to ask for information on two points. I believe that on both sides of the House there is a genuine desire in regard to water-tube boilers that the whole question should be investigated and their efficiency or otherwise clearly demonstrated. I would ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is true that the Committee, the appointment of which we have all welcomed, will have power to require that ships in Her Majesty's Navy of every class shall promptly be subjected to practical tests for a sufficient period to demonstrate whether or not the Belleville boilers with which they are fitted are efficient or otherwise. In the next place I would draw the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to the declaration made in this House by Her Majesty's Government, that they would place gunboats on the inland waterways of China to protect the lives and property of British traders. When I visited the Upper Yang-tze a short time ago I found the two gunboats sent to patrol that part were deficient both as regards steaming power and construction for the purpose for which they were intended. I am desirous to draw the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to this important question in view of the grave situation in China to-day, when the lives and property of British subjects are seriously endangered not only on the Upper Yang-tsze, but throughout every quarter of China. The two gunboats sent to patrol the Upper Yang-tsze are only able to steam eleven knots, and they have twin screws instead of paddle wheels.

MR. GOSCHEN: What does the hon. Member mean by "patrol the Upper Yang-tsze"?

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON: To patrol the Yang-tsze from Ichang upwards.

MR. GOSCHEN: These boats were never constructed for that purpose.

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON: The pledge given by the Government was to put boats on the inland waterways for the purpose of protecting British trade.

MR. GOSCHEN: I will explain to the hon. Member. These vessels were not built for the purpose. They were built for the general purpose of river service in China; but when it was decided that the gorges should be ascended, these two gunboats were given the task, notwithstanding that they were not specially built for it. At some risk, they undertook to ascend the gorges, and they succeeded in going up.

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON: I will ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, in view of the pledge given by the Government, that British gunboats should be placed on the inland waterways of China for the protection of British trade, and in view of his declaration that the "Woodcock" and the "Woodlark" are unsuitable for patrolling the upper part of the Yang-tsze, whether he has included in the Estimates the sum required for building suitable gunboats in point of steaming power and construction for that service, especially in view of the serious danger to the lives of British subjects in that quarter. There is at present one steamer at Chungking, and I hope that in view of the present emergency the First Lord of the Admiralty may be able to say that he is favourably considering the offer made to him of that boat, and so secure that there shall be one steamer on the Upper Yang-tsze able to afford some protection for the lives and property of his subjects.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, there have been some negotiations for the purchase of that steamer.

2. £4,139,100, for Shipbuilding pairs, Maintenance, etc.—Material

3. £2,523,000, for Shipbuilding pairs, Maintenance, etc.—Personnel

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): I did not know whether at the (12.25) the First Lord of the Admiralty considered the opportunity favourable for a long discussion on this most important Vote. In the past they had been full and ample opportunity of doing it in all its bearings. He suggested the First Lord of the Admiralty as on two previous occasions, & gave Members an opportunity of going and placing before him their views on various points with which they were dealing. If he agreed to that it would be necessary to continue the discussion now.

MR. GOSCHEN agreed to the motion, remarking that it would be useful to him to know the views of Members.

Vote agreed to.

4. £793,200 (Additional) Naval Supplementary).

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that was one question which he wished to ask about this Vote. He did not know whether the question was in order. He did not know whether this included payments for lyddite. This was an answer given to him that day by a representative of the War Office. He referred to the naval lyddite. He desired to ask whether the Admiralty had satisfied themselves as to the cost of making picric acid for the manufacture of lyddite in this country in time of war. Although he had framed a question

subject he had been unable to get the information he desired. There appeared in the accounts a sum of £16,000 for lyddite shells in times of peace. Up to very recently picric acid was not made in this country at all. The answer he obtained was that it was possible to store it against times of war, but as he understood that picric acid would not keep for any length of time, and that being so it was of urgent importance that there should be plant and machinery in this country adequate to the strain to which we should be put in time of war. Another point upon which he desired information, and which was of the first importance, was as to the reserve of guns. In the early portion of the session, the right hon. Gentleman discussed the position of the reserve of naval guns, and he knew that where four guns were made for a ship in the past, there are now five—that was to say, that one extra gun was made for every ship. That was not a true reserve. It was absolutely necessary for us to have a greater reserve of guns than any other Power, as, owing to the use of cordite, there was a very much greater erosion than before. He doubted whether the amount in this Vote for a reserve of guns was sufficient, as he could not but think that in the face of the greater erosion of guns that reserve ought to be very much increased. Full charges were never fired from the guns in times of peace, and even then the erosion was great, but in times of war, when full charges were used, the life of a naval gun was very short.

ADMIRAL FIELD did not wish to prolong the debate, and therefore proposed that Report might be taken to-morrow, when discussion could be allowed.

*SIR J. COLOMB noticed that the reserve for cordite was £28,000. He desired to know whether that was the full estimate for the total amount necessary for the reserve at different stages. He was delighted to find that the Admiralty had become alive to the necessity of considering the reserve of warlike stores.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, N.) said that throughout the whole discussion which had taken place no doubt had been thrown upon the capacity of the Government to deal with these matters. In answer to the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth, he might say that the Government thought it necessary to provide a reserve of warlike stores adequate to their needs. The £709,000 was a balance.

*SIR J. COLOMB: This £709,000 is part of the total Estimate that is required.

MR. MACARTNEY: Yes.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE complained that the Estimate did not show the proportion of guns in reserve. His point was that the reserve of twelve-inch guns was deficient.

MR. GOSCHEN said that, as a matter of fact, guns were made for new ships before they were able to receive them, and that in itself constituted a very good reserve. As to the twelve-inch guns, all the guns had been carefully gone through as to their calibre.

ADMIRAL FIELD said, as his suggestion had not been taken before the Vote went through, he desired to have some information as to the cordite explosion on board the "Revenge," and also some information as to the supply of armour-piercing projectiles and shells, which he was informed was very short. He also understood that while the French had a shell which would pierce our armour, we had not one which would pierce theirs.

Vote agreed to.

5. £267,100, Admiralty Office.

*SIR J. COLOMB pointed out that it was now half-past twelve o'clock, and that was the hour at which it was proposed to discuss this Vote, which was the only one upon which general questions as to the training of officers, etc., could be raised. He did not want to trouble the House at so late an hour, but at the same time there were several points upon which he desired information.

and therefore he should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury was prepared to take the Report stage at a more reasonable time.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am most anxious to meet my hon. friend, but, looking at the position in which I am placed, I do not think it would be possible to do as he suggests, and I should only be doing him an injustice if I made the promise he asks for.

*SIR J. COLOMB supposed that under those circumstances he would have to make his observations as short as possible, and confine them to one point. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that he had put a question as to the amount of sea service which was done by officers in training in the Channel and Mediterranean Squadrons, and he asked that question because he believed that the sea service was far too short. There was too much training on shore, and too little training at sea. He had asked a question as to the amount of time spent at sea and on shore by Admirals from the time of their being appointed lieutenants, and his right hon. friend replied that it was not possible to give an account of an Admiral's training in that way. The present Commander-in-Chief of the Mediterranean Fleet had only six or seven years service afloat in thirty years. He would shut up the discussion at once if his right hon. friend would promise a Return showing the sea and shore services of the different Admirals whose flags were flying, and the amount of time they had spent at sea since promotion to lieutenants. This question was agitating the service very much. It was a burning question in every service club, and on board of every ship. He hoped the First Lord would give him the information he asked on simple matters of fact.

ADMIRAL FIELD said the First Sea Lord had been turned out of his house

because the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unwilling to give the extra £100,000 demanded by the ground landlord. It was most important that the new building should be near the Admiralty, because telegrams sometimes arrived during the night which required prompt attention.

THE EARL OF DALKEITH (Leicestershire) said he sincerely trusted that his right hon. friend would put this matter into serious consideration so that in future the First Lord might be provided with a house for his work, where he could attend to the important questions which were to be dealt with in all parts of the country without delay.

MR. GOSCHEN said, in reply to the question raised by the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth, that the present commanders were not one whit less able to manage their ships than their predecessors. The dashing young officers who were in command of the torpedo boat destroyers were doing excellent work, and training themselves for the duties they would have to perform. In view of the number of men in commission and the few disasters which had occurred, any want of seamanship in the fleet did not think it was proved that there was any falling off in our navy. There might be less good sailing in regard to the qualities of some of the ships, but he thought the records proved that there was no falling off in the capacity of the officers. He promised to look into the matter. Return asked for by the hon. Member.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYDOVER): This Bill has been framed in advance two objects of importance, a third object which, though undervalued of importance, is, as I hope to be able to prove to the House, rather a new method and of the convenience, and economy which will be derived from it. I cannot better explain the objects of the Bill or submit arguments in its favour better than by referring to the Report of the Committee which sat on the Volunteer Act in 1894, for, in the first place, we propose to act upon the recommendation unanimously arrived at, of the Committee. It was a strong Committee, the chairman being the hon. Member Hanley, at that time the Financial Secretary of the War Office in the late Government, and it included many Members of the House who are, I think, well to be regarded as authorities in matters affecting the Auxiliary forces, such as hon. and gallant Members for Bath, Sheffield, Lichfield, Ipswich, and Leith District. This is how we have described what is the first object of our Bill. They first recite that the present liability to actual military service as it stands in the Volunteer Act (Section 17 of the Volunteer Act of 1892) provides that in cases of actual or threatened invasion in any part of the Kingdom, the occasion being proclaimed to both Houses of Parliament is sitting, or declared in Council and notified by proclamation if Parliament is not sitting, "Her Majesty may call out the Volunteer corps of the several counties or of any of them for ary service." Upon that the Committee found, in the following words—

 "There was practical unanimity expressed that the national security might be seriously threatened under conceivable circumstances short of actual or apprehended invasion."

The Committee then went on to say—

"Our Committee is of opinion that the land employed in the Reserve Forces Act of Section 12, and in the Militia Act of the year, under which the Army Reserve men are liable to be called out for service and the Militia to be embodied in case of imminent national danger or grave emergency, might be more fittingly adopted."

These are the words which we propose to substitute in the Volunteer Act for the words which call for a declaration of apprehended invasion. Not only was the report of the Committee unanimous, but the next year—1895—several members of the Committee in the course of debate expressed great regret that the Government of the day had not adopted their recommendations; and the hon. Member for Hanley who had presided over the Committee, and who was at the time a Member of the Government, while defending the proposals which the Government did bring in, used these words—

"He hoped that none of the recommendations of the Committee would be lost sight of, and he joined with those who regarded this Bill merely as an instalment."

So that this proposal to substitute the words I have recited for those in the Act, were unanimously recommended six years ago; and a year later the chairman of the Committee, a member of the Government and responsible for the War Office, declared that what they did then must be considered merely as an instalment. Therefore it cannot be said that this is a new plot to revolutionise the character of the Volunteer force. It is, in my opinion, and in the opinion of others who have studied the force, rather a somewhat belated step which is necessary if the Volunteer forces are to be put in a position to discharge the primary functions which they exist to perform. It cannot be said that the circumstances which were conceivable six years ago have not been more fully present to our minds in the early months of this year than in any recent period of our history. I do not base myself on this Report alone, although its weight and authority can hardly be disputed, but I rest myself also upon the experience of the last year, and I may almost say of the last two years. I submit that no Government, during a period of emergency when, perhaps, the Ambassador accredited to this Court from a foreign country was in daily conference with the Foreign Minister in this country—no Government at such a period would declare by Royal proclamation that they had apprehension of an invasion, because such a declaration would paralyse diplomacy and precipitate the very thing they wished to avoid. But if that is so, what is the necessary consequence? It is that you cannot mobilise your Volunteers until an invasion takes place. If the Government cannot and will not issue the proclamation which is necessary because of diplomatic considerations, then when it is issued you will have to mobilise your Volunteers in camp to perform all those operations which have been found more difficult than ever before. You will have to turn them into an effective field army in forty-eight hours. It cannot be done. It is not fair either to the Government, or to the Volunteers themselves, who have shown so much capacity, to ask them to take the field against invasion without some two or three weeks of necessary preparation. Again, we have not dashed into this. It is not an attempt to legislate hurriedly at the end of the session. A conference was called in April last of many representative officers of the Volunteer corps, and not merely of those who represent the London Volunteers. There were four representatives of the North-Eastern district, three of the North-Western, one of the Eastern, one of the Western, one of the South-Eastern, three of Scotland, and only three from London. These sixteen commanding officers of Volunteers were unanimously of opinion that this change ought forthwith to be made. There are other Members of this House, such as the hon. and gallant Member for Kilmarnock, who concur, and it is, indeed, the unanimous recommendation of the Volunteer commanding officers in this country. There have been only two objections, so far as I have heard; one is so frivolous that perhaps I ought not to trouble the House with it. It is said that this Committee did not recommend legislation, but if one turns to the Report it will be seen that that remark is applicable to only one subject—the calling out of the Volunteers to aid the civil power. It is evident that for the rest legislation was recommended. Another objection has been that, if this Bill passes, it will be possible for the Government to call out the Volunteers without being under the obligation of summoning Parliament within ten days. But that has always been true of our Volunteer Act, although this House somewhat jealously restricted the powers of the Executive in matters of defence, actuated by memories of dangers which are long past—dangers harboured in the minds of the Whigs—lest the Crown should use the Army to oppress the people—dangers harboured in the minds of the Tories—lest it should be used to entangle the country in Continental combinations. But those dangers, which were real at one time, were killed and buried by our ancestors nearly 200 years ago. If anyone wishes to perform ceremonial rights over their graves, I have no objection to move the necessary Amendment: but I consider it to be perfectly idle. But, with or without that, let us have a measure which will meet the dangers that do actually exist in our own day, and not those of a previous generation. Then I come to the second object of the Bill, and in order to explain it I cannot do better than quote another passage from the Report of the Committee which sat six years ago. They say—

"It may be expedient that the garrisons of certain exposed forts, to be manned by Volunteer artillery and corps enrolled for submarine and other coast defence, should be called out at a much earlier stage than the language of the Act would seem to authorise. It has also been suggested that the Secretary of State should be empowered to call out portions of corps, and accept the services of Volunteers proffered under circumstances falling short of the great emergency contemplated; and your Committee concur in thinking such an amendment of the law desirable."

A great deal has happened since 1894. There has been a development in the construction of torpedo-boats among all the navies of the world. This House has authorised the expenditure of large sums of money upon forts, search-lights, and submarine mines to protect the waterways which led up to our commercial harbours. It may not be within the knowledge of all present that we look to the Volunteer Garrison Artillery of this country, in many cases wholly, and in all cases mainly, for the protection of our commercial ports. The Humber, the Tees, Sunderland, the Tyne, the Bristol Channel, the Firth of Forth, the Tay, Aberdeen, and the Clyde are protected against any sudden raid by the Volunteer Garrison Artillery, who are told off to occupy the forts and man the guns, and to look after the submarine mines for which this country has so much money of recent years. The garrisons of these forts require 7,500 out of the 35,000 garrison artillerymen in this country, and I do submit that that money will be wasted and that patriotism and devotion to duty of the men will be wasted too, unless the House sees fit to give this enabling power which the Government now ask. It may be that, at first sight, some exceptions may be taken to the methods which we have pursued. This enabling power, which would allow us to slip the garrisons into the forts without making appeal to patriotism, and without having meetings called by mayors and lord lieutenants, and without behaving in a way which would be considered insane in any other country in a period of tension is given by Section 2A of this Bill—

"It shall be lawful for Her Majesty to accept the offer of any member of a Volunteer corps to subject himself to one or both of the following liabilities:—(a) To be called out for military service at any time," etc.

It may be that in order to effect our object we have taken too wide power, but why are the words so wide? It is because the Volunteer Act—the law of the land as it now exists—prescribes and even circumscribes, the occasion on which a Volunteer can be used so closely that without this enabling power it is impossible to use a Volunteer until after the issue of a Royal Proclamation. Even if the Act is amended by Section 1, it will still be necessary to give to the Government of the day an enabling power which will permit of putting the garrisons into these forts. I have laid before the House a Paper which indicates the kind of regulations which might be useful for the Volunteers under the Volunteer Act as amended by this Bill; and as regards the corps to garrison forts, it is laid down that—

"A member of a Volunteer corps may contract to come out for active military service at specified places in Great Britain whenever summoned by order of the Secretary of State for War, to serve for a period not exceeding one month, in the absence of a Royal proclamation calling out the Volunteers generally."

That is all that is intended under Section 2A of this Bill. We must have such an enabling power to take that step which is requisite for national defence. It is clear that no pressure will be needed to get 7,500 men out of 35,000 to man these forts and guns. I visited one of these during Whitsuntide, and I can assure the House that they do get full payment for their money in respect of the Volunteer Garrison Artillery. The six commanding officers of Volunteers whom I conferred were unanimous in saying that this proposal should also be made law forthwith. I do not think that introducing the Bill I need say more at this stage on those two objects of the Bill. I shall be ready in Committee to meet in detail any objections which may be urged, though I find it difficult to imagine what objections could be urged against these proposals recommended six years ago by a Committee, recommended unanimously by every Volunteer commanding officer whom we have consulted, and also, I think, recommended by recent experience. I come now to the third object of this Bill, which I have described as being rather a matter of method and of convenience. The employment of Volunteers upon active service is not a new question. The Volunteers begged that a certain number should be allowed to take part in active service in 1878; they put forward the same request in 1885; and letter after letter has reached me from Volunteers during the last year complaining—and I quote the language of one letter—that they have been snubbed by the military authorities. The same requests were put forward last June, when some people—though not many—thought that we might be plunged into war, as we were eventually. Again the Volunteers complained that they were snubbed by the military authorities because we were not prepared to accept the offers that were made. The press of the country rang with criticisms against the War Office because it did not at once accept those offers. In January it was impossible to refuse these offers, not because the Regular forces and the Militia could not have dealt adequately with the situation in South Africa, but when you are employing Regulars, Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers from Canada, South Africa, and Australia, it was felt that you would be putting a stigma on the Volunteers of this country which would affect the future of the corps if you did not allow them to co-operate with the other forces throughout the Empire. Is it, or is it not, a legitimate aspiration on the part of the Volunteers that those among them who wish to perfect themselves by seeing active service when the whole Empire takes part in fending off some Imperial danger should, if they wish, take a share in the work? Whether that aspiration is legitimate or not has become an academic question. I am convinced that the only practical question which presents itself to us as businesslike men is whether, that being so, the experiment should be repeated under the deplorable conditions which obtained last year. Last year we had to apply tests when every official of the War Office and every officer in the military districts were overworked. The Volunteers had to shoot ankle deep in slush, or to lie down in snow in the fading light of a winter afternoon; and it is ridiculous to assent to a proposition that such offers are to be accepted, and yet we are not to make businesslike preparation for testing in time of peace the men who are willing to come forward in time of emergency. I know it has been said that possibly when this Bill is passed pressure will be put on the Volunteers. Pressure will be avoided. It is when the time of Imperial danger comes, when the press is ringing with patriotic sentiment, when meetings are held all over the country, that pressure is put. It is then, when the authorities might be disposed to accept such offers, that many men are of two minds as to whether they are bound to volunteer or not. How different would it be if in times of peace and quiet those men who have two or three years of their lives to devote to such preparation, who are unmarried, and have no great responsibilities, could register their names and submit themselves to the necessary tests and enter into a contract under such conditions as are agreeable to them, and who will be at your call in the event of a period of Imperial danger coming upon us! The Leader of the Opposition the other day said that these matters were of such grave importance that nothing should be done in a hurry. I agree with that view. It is because we wish to avoid hurry that we bring in this Bill, because in the one or two years during which the Volunteers of the country can discuss the terms, tests, and the conditions under which they would like to see some active service, it is necessary that we should have a period of leisure; and you cannot have this period of leisure unless the enabling powers of this Bill are given to the Government.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): Would the exercise of the option take place on enrolment?

MR. WYNDHAM: At any time in the military life of any man if certain standards were fulfilled. I will read a draft of the kind of regulations which could be issued if enabling powers were conferred—

"A member of a Volunteer corps may contract to proceed on active service in any part of the world in a unit or company formed of Volunteers on such conditions as may be defined by the terms of his contract."

In these words "in a unit or company" which are laid down here the Government pledges itself to the intention conveyed by the words. What the Volunteers want is that they should go out as Volunteers in order to gain some experience of warfare, not to be used as drafts or as garrisons during a time of Imperial pressure. In order to avoid misconception on that point I propose in Committee to move an Amendment which will say that a particular Volunteer can subject himself to the first or both of the liabilities, because I feel that if a Volunteer is, under the terms of the Act, allowed to engage in any part of the world without reference to active military service it may be thought that it is the intention of the Government to send Volunteers to the Mediterranean or Ceylon during a period of Imperial unrest. That is not the intention of the Government; it is solely as I have described it—the terms to be discussed and the conditions to be formulated in a methodical manner under normal conditions. The inconvenience which was experienced last year can hardly be imagined. In one case a company of Volunteers was enrolled, and out of 110 men only 38 were found to conform to the tests we stipulated. We had to pay £5 to every one of those 110 men. It was not the fault of the men that they had been improperly passed, and you cannot blame people for imperfect inspection if you ask them to conduct the preliminaries in a time of war instead of, more properly, in a time of peace. Good work cannot be done under the emotion of the moment. I read in the press that if dangers come our Volunteers and every subject of the Queen would patriotically place his services at the disposal of the Government. No doubt, and all credit to them; but it is not fair to them that their services should be accepted under those conditions. Emotion will not do work which can only be done by method quietly applied. It is one of the facts we have learned from the past; it is also an intelligent lesson for the future. There is one other consideration which I cannot refrain from submitting. When introducing the Army Estimates on 12th March, 1901, I had occasion to recognise the spirit of patriotism of the colonies during recent troubles. I deprecated any action on our part. But if there is no dictation or no solicitation on our part then I think it is our duty to set an example to our colonies. All the difficulties and inconveniences which we experienced were also experienced in our colonies. The sudden summoning of men, the sudden summoning of men as Volunteers, and many who are testing of them, the selection of them, and the proper equipment during of emergency were as rife in the colonies as here. If we are not to dictate, let us set an example to our colonies, and show them how their efforts can be co-ordinated in time so as to avoid the scrambling which obtained during the Boer war in January. I should be sorry to see the Act to lay down, or attempt to lay down, an exact description of the terms of contract into which such Volunteers may care to enter. It may be that the City Imperial Volunteers could be sent if they may desire to enter into an arrangement as would admit of a similar course of proceeding should other occasion arise. It may be that some regiments, notably the London Fusiliers, one of the oldest in the world which fought at Minden, and is celebrating Minden day on 1st August, could be proud to be associated more in time with the Regulars. It may be that the Volunteers of a county may wish to send that county by amalgamating the Volunteers with the battalion. I am sorry to say that any one of these projects should be adopted or discussed. All that I ask is that the hands of the Executive may be unfettered, so that in time of peace and leisure the work of the Volunteers may be gathered as a business-like plan adopted for the effect to those wishes in time of war. I do not think I have anything to urge. It may be that, in spite of the unanimous Report, in spite of the experience of last winter, some may wish to construe this Act in such a way

It is suggested that the character of our Volunteer force will be changed by these provisions. I am not entertained by the fear is not entertained by the Volunteer colonels whom we have considered. Any such madcap project is beyond the power of this or any other Government. If these suggestions are made the Government cannot take shelter behind them in order to evade its duty. The first two objects of the Bill are necessary to the efficiency of national defence; and on that question the Government must lead. It is the duty of the Government to see that the money which the nation has lavished on our Volunteers should not be wasted; that the insurance which the country is taking is a sound one; that the Volunteers, if called upon to defend our shores, shall be given facilities for mobilisation, in the absence of which their devotion will be wholly cast away. The third point I do not put so highly, but still I earnestly recommend it to the favourable consideration of the House. In this country and in the colonies there are many men who cannot afford the time to enter the Regular Army or even the Militia, but who still wish to be ready against the hour of national danger and to prepare against that hour by taking some part in active military operations by studying in the only school, as recent events have proved, which is effective as a preparation for the military profession. You can no longer say to the Volunteers of this country, "You and you only out of all the forces of the Empire shall never see a shot fired until the enemy is at the gate"; and if you cannot say that, it is again the duty of the Government to see that such Volunteers as wish it may have a reasonable opportunity of business-like preparation. I beg to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Wyndham.)

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I desire to oppose this Bill on two grounds—first, on the specific ground of the proposals it contains, and, secondly, because its character is such that it should not be brought in as an isolated measure at this time. The hon. Gentleman has dwelt at some length on the first part of the Bill, and I imagine there will be no objection on the part of any section of this House to the first two clauses. That sixteen representative members of the Volunteer force should have recommended the introduction of a clause which gives power to prepare, in the only way in which preparation can be made, for the performance of the duty for which Volunteers are enrolled, is not to be wondered at, for it is idle to imagine that we can utilise the Volunteers effectively for the defence of our fortresses and our ports without subjecting them to training before the actual demand is made on their services. It is only to one portion of the second clause that I object, and I will give my reasons as briefly as I can for so objecting. I object first on the merits. I do not know that that is a fatal objection, for times have changed and conditions have changed. My special objection is that it is a varying of the whole underlying principle on which the Volunteer force was originally raised. It was undoubtedly intended to be a domestic force for the protection of this country against invasion. Such an invasion was apprehended in 1859, and it was to meet that danger that the Volunteer force was raised. I do not, however, press that point, because, after all, I am one of those who are anxious that our military organisation should be varied to meet the changes in our situation. Still, I think the necessity must be clearly shown before Parliament is justified in so fundamentally altering the character of the whole Volunteer force, as is implied in the second clause of this Bill. As a matter of fact, under this Bill these men will cease to be Volunteers; they will simply be Reservists of the regular Army, and not only that, but they will be Reservists under a disqualification which does not apply to other Reservists of the Army. The present Reservist is liable to be called out by Royal Proclamation, and Parliament must meet to sanction that step within a certain specified time, but I do not see that any such obligation is imposed upon the Government with regard to the Volunteers who are dealt with by this Bill—Volunteers as you call them, but Army Reservists as I call them. I think it would be well for the House and country to understand that these men will, to all intents and purposes, with one single exception, cease to be Volunteers; they will be transferred by the Bill to the Army Reserve. Again, the Bill introduces an additional outside element into the Regular Army which, I think, is not desirable in itself. It is most desirable that we should have a perfectly homogeneous force as our first line, and that anything done to supplement it should be by way of utilising some second line apart from the Army altogether, and not by breaking up one organisation in order to supply the deficiencies of another. I am glad to hear that the units are in all cases to be formed of Volunteers. I think, however, it is to be regretted that under this Bill the efforts of the Volunteer officers of constituted units will be absolutely thrown away. They will, no doubt, have done public service by acting as an attraction to bring young men into the corps, and in giving them that instruction which fits them to take part in the operations of the regular Army. But as colonels, majors, and captains of Volunteer units their functions will practically cease when the men are taken away from their corps. I think that will prove a serious injury to Volunteer corps themselves. The question was raised in another place as to whether the drafts taken in pursuance of this arrangement would be considered supernumerary to the corps—whether in the event of 200 Volunteers being taken away from a Volunteer battalion, they would be replaced by additions to the battalion. I understood the Secretary of State to announce that there was no intention of considering these men as supernumerary, and that their places would not be taken by others. That is unfortunate, for you will be doing exactly what was done to the disadvantage of the Militia, and at the time when the services of the Volunteer Corps may be greatly needed you will be depriving the force of the most competent of its members to serve with some other unit of which it does not form part. We have had experience of that system, and I do not believe that there is any officer, either of the Militia or of the Line, who does not share my opinion that the practice of utilising the Militia Reserve as part of the Militia in time of peace, and then suddenly in case of emergency withdrawing them, as they have been withdrawn in instances of which I am aware, has been most detrimental to the Militia battalions. I know of battalions which have been absolutely emasculated and deprived of more than half of their value by having, on embodiment, some 250 of their very best men taken from them. I should be very reluctant to see the same practice pursued in regard to the Volunteers. There is another point. It appears to me exceedingly likely that if any consider able number of men undertake the question they will, by doing so, interfere with their employment. The question to a certain extent arises serving in the Militia, and probably do so to a greater extent when they are called out, as I hope they will be longer periods of service. But when they pass from the Militia to the Volunteer class of men—with men in high and responsible employment, often of a confidential nature, who can ill be spared that employment. There are many corps, as hon. Members know, in which there are many such men, and yet they are the very men who form the best material to take for this purpose— young, energetic, educated men, only anxious to exercise in the field those which they have learned in times of peace. We have seen hundreds of them come out during the present emergency. The response which has been made by employers of skilled and unskilled labour has been magnificent, and I think the country has reason to be proud of it. The strain put upon employers has been very considerable, and I believe it is dangerous to renew that strain too often. If you do so the day may arrive when these young men may find themselves face to face with the question whether they shall still remain in their employment. That would place them in a most embarrassing position. There is another and perhaps more forcible objection to the Bill. It has been urged in its favour that it would strengthen the military service of this country. But I fail to see how it will produce the only single advantage expected from it. I strongly agree with every word said by the hon. Member the Under Secretary for War as to the necessity of organised preparation for the emergency of war in times of peace. I have been humbly preaching that doctrine for many years past. If it were really a contribution to more efficient organisation and preparation, if it gave the War Office more knowledge of the material with which it would have to deal in times of war, a knowledge which is so essential to the satisfactory carrying out of military operations, I would at once consent to the Bill. The Under Secretary for War said it was better we should do this now and not wait for a time of pressure, but the pressure will come all the same, whenever we go to and, however many men enrol themselves under the provisions of this Bill, will represent but a tithe of the number who will come forward when an emergency threatens this country. Of course, it is very desirable that the Office should know that it has so many Volunteers of whom it can dispose in the case of war. But, even if this Bill is passed, I do not suppose they will have any clearer idea than they already have. They will, perhaps, have 5,000 inscribed their names on the roll. In a case of a real emergency, probably 50,000 will be found ready to come forward. We have already had ample evidence of that. Men will not come forward for an unforeseen contingency, whereas they will come forward for a foreseen one, and the "waiting companies" which were called for by the Secretary of State from Volunteer corps to supply the waste occasioned by the war were not raised. With hardly an exception the corps called upon to raise men failed to do so. That is an illustration in proof of my assertion. For every Englishman engaged in a civil occupation who will come forward to pledge himself to take part in a war of which he knows nothing, you will probably get twenty, thirty, or it may be a hundred Volunteers when the actual emergency arises. There is another difficulty. Suppose you get 5,000 men upon your Volunteer roll. Campaigns must now be planned in advance. To be efficient they must be planned not a day, a week or a month, but a year beforehand. But what is the objection? Five thousand men may take an obligation to-day, but in six months time every one of them by giving a fortnight's notice might get rid of his liability. But that is not quite the end of the evil. My hon. friend talks of there being no pressure; there will be pressure, and pressure of a very undesirable kind, if this Bill is passed into law. Hundreds and thousands of Volunteers are engaged in political conflicts, or at any rate hold very strong political views. It happens that we are engaged in a war which has the sympathy of the enormous majority of the people of this country, but it is quite conceivable that this country might be engaged in a war which did not at all move the feelings of the people; it might be a war to which not only an inconsiderable minority, but a very large minority would object as strongly as some hon.

Members now object to the present war. In that case you would have that most unfortunate occurrence, a direct conflict between political conviction and military duty. For a soldier there is only one law—namely, whatever orders he receives, to obey them; but that is not the case with civilians in ordinary life. You will put every one of these men into the dilemma of having to undertake active service for a cause in which they may not only not believe, but which they may have actually condemned, or of doing what is most distasteful and practically impossible—namely, taking the opportunity presented by the danger to abandon the undertaking they have given, and thereby lay themselves open to the charge of not having carried out their obligations. These are serious objections, worthy of the attention of the House. But there is another objection which, from my point of view, outweighs them all. At the beginning of this session I took part in debates on the Army, and I said I was most willing to concede everything asked for by the Government by way of providing for a temporary emergency. I said that the emergency was grave, and that the safety of the country, or at any rate the safety of our Army, was imperilled, and that we could not stop to discuss the exact effect of the emergency measures then proposed. I said that the responsibility rested with the Government, that they might do what they pleased as long as they got the thing done, and I am bound to say nearly every other hon. Member took a similar view. I said at the same time that I would oppose every proposal for a permanent alteration in our military system which was undertaken apart from and without any reference to any general scheme of reorganisation. We have been told over and over again that we were not to bring these questions up during the present session, and we were told that if we did no answer would be given, as it was impossible under present conditions even to discuss the reorganisation of our Army; and yet there is a universal admission that until we have this reorganisation we are liable to a repetition of the danger which threatened us at the beginning of this year. I think it would be most illogical and most unwise to retreat from the position we then took up, and sanction one more of these everlasting emergency measures, which, however, is not an emergency measure in the sense that it is permanent. Do not do something under the plea of emergency which may make it impossible, and will certainly make it difficult, to recast our military system as many of us believe it ought to be recast as a whole. It is not easy to discuss this matter as it ought to be discussed. I regret that the Vote for the salary of the Secretary of State for War has been withdrawn from the consideration of the House, because I believe that great organic changes ought not to be entrusted to the present Secretary of State for War in view of the language he has used, the things he has done, and the things he has left undone. But we are not to be allowed this year, when popular opinion is peculiarly directed to the duties performed by the Secretary of State for War, to discuss the exact position.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) dissented.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I am very glad indeed if I am rightly corrected by the right hon. Gentleman, but I understood that the Vote for the salary of the Secretary of State for War was not to be included.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It would be well, perhaps, to clear up that point, because I understood that a whole day would, if necessary, be given to it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): My recollection is that I stated that as some seventeen days had already been given to the Army Estimates it seemed to me that either the Foreign Office Vote or the Colonial Office Vote might be discussed; but I have no objection whatever to the Vote for the salary of the Secretary of State for War being discussed, if the Votes I have mentioned are discussed at short length.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: If the Vote for the salary of the Secretary of State for War is taken, the task imposed on me will be an easier one: but that need not interfere with my present argument. If we are to have this piecemeal legislation I want to know of what system it is to form a part. The Secretary of State for War has made some statements which bear very closely on that matter. Then this Bill when all is done will be the addition of 5,000, 6,000, or 7,000 men at the outside to the Army, but we should be careful before making that addition to have a clear standing as to whether the system which that is a part is to go on. I years we have had confusion between the Line, the Militia, and the Volunteers; no one now knows what are the functions which these three great bodies called upon to perform. They have been tied together by an emergency bond. The Militia has been robbed to supply the Line, and the Volunteers have been induced by the Army recruiting agents to give up their recruits. We have the Volunteers in this campaign as an organised military force, but as emergency men taken to the patent defects of a system which had failed to contemplate contingencies to which we were exposed. I want to know, will it be wise to take this step before we ascertain what the Secretary of State for War is going to do to rectify the condition of the Militia described the other day? He was rebuffed by a noble Lord what we were doing with the hundred thousand men who were at home, and in reply he said that the Lord must be perfectly well as to that hundred thousand men, ninety-two thousand men, were an organised force in any sense of the word. I quite agree they are not; but I know why it is not possible to have a system by which we can get an organised force without upsetting the whole position of the Volunteers. We have made it made perfectly clear in this House the waste in the regular Army is enormous that in seven years it amounts to no less than one hundred thousand men, the whole cost of instruction, clothing, and housing is lost. On the other hand, by the Secretary of State's admission, we have no less than one hundred thousand unorganised regular men in this country. I think it would be infinitely better if we were to pass a very unfortunate Bill, which is the subject of considerable objection, until we have time to see how far arrangements can be made for the organisation of our militia on a scale which would be sufficient for the country at large. My hon. friend said that we ought to set an example to the colonies. We are all in f an example to the colonies. We have been setting an example to the colonies for a very long time past. We set them an example in raising our forces for the defence of the Empire across the seas, and I think we shall be perfectly content to keep this force in our own hands. I think the colonies will not be particularly moved by anything we may do or leave undone in regard to it. For these reasons I think this Bill is not to the public advantage. I think its object is, comparatively speaking, unimportant.

MR. WYNDHAM: Does my hon. friend object to the first clause also?

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Of course I am a warm supporter of that first clause; my sole objection is to the second clause. I fail to realise the object with which this Bill has been introduced. I think it is in contravention of the agreement which has existed, that if it were desirable that any change should be made at present in our military system it should not be a permanent change. At any rate, I hoped that that might be the line of action that might have recommended itself to the Government. I should like to say one word about an argument used by my hon. friend. He said that a large number of Volunteer officers were in favour of this Bill. I do not know whether that approval extends to the whole of the Bill, but I will assume it does. I must point out that this submission to the recommendations of a Committee is rather new at the War Office. I recollect Commissions which dealt with subjects of far greater importance than this Bill deals with, and included among their members many important personages, and yet their Reports were disregarded and pigeon-holed, and nothing was done regarding them. I can well understand the attitude of these Volunteer officers, but I believe I am quite right in saying that in this matter they are not representative, as far as the second clause is concerned, of the whole Volunteer force. It is perfectly true that they think that the years they have been serving have been wasted, and that feeling is shared by many of us. The Volunteers have felt that they have been kept under arms without organisation for no specific purpose and have not been allowed to be of any use to themselves or to the country, and I do not wonder that spirited, capable, and competent men as they are should take the first opportunity given them of showing their willingness to do anything or everything that might be asked of them. But this matter must be decided by some higher authority than the dictum of sixteen Volunteer officers. It must be decided by Parliament and by the nation, and therefore I am not moved as much as my hon. friend supposed I should be moved by the views of the Volunteer officers. Of course, they desire that we should give them employment and the opportunity of exhibiting their zeal in the interests of their country. I do hope that my hon. friend will consider whether it is absolutely imperative that the second clause of this Bill should be passed into law, and I shall move an Amendment, which I hope he will accept at a later stage, to omit that clause. I believe it will be to the interests of the country if my hon. friend confines himself to passing the first part of the Bill, which is a necessary official act to perfect the machinery of the Volunteer force. I beg to move that the Bill be read this day three months.

*CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to second the motion for the rejection of this Bill. I do so because I am of opinion that it will completely destroy the principle on which our Volunteer force is based. I am sure it will be conceded that I am one of the last who would attempt to do anything which would cripple the Government in any way during the present crisis. I have been one of those who have given the Government in conjunction with the arrangements for the present war a loyal and hearty support, and I am as anxious as any hon. Member in this House to see both our regular and auxiliary forces placed on the best possible basis. But, as the hon. Member for West Belfast has stated, this is a most inopportune time to introduce a measure of this nature. To the first clause of the Bill, which proposes to substitute for the words "actual or apprehended invasion," the words "imminent national danger or great emergency," there is no opposition. The Judge Advocate General, who is a great authority on these subjects, however, pointed out that there was great difficulty with reference to the definition of the word "emergency." I may add that the adjective "great" in the clause is tautology and altogether irrelevant. According to the Judge Advocate General, when the Militia is embodied, then a state of emergency arises, and I think it is extremely doubtful whether the employers of this country will be parties to giving facilities to those who work under them to be called out practically as a first-class Army Reserve whenever it may seem desirable to embody the Militia. With reference to Clause 2 of the Bill, which is of great importance, the Under Secretary for War states that it is not a new project; but if it is not a new project to call upon the Volunteers to turn themselves into a military force, then I know not what a new project is. If we look back on the history of the Volunteer force we will see that it arose in a moment of grave national peril, when Napoleon was encamped on the heights of Boulogne, and a descent on these coasts was expected at any moment. This force, which arose under these circumstances, is now to be turned into a first-class Army reserve without being consulted at a whole. It is stated that sixteen colonels of Volunteers favour this measure. It would be a very strange thing if the colonels of the various Volunteer corps would not be willing to do everything they could to improve the position of their corps in the eyes of their fellow countrymen. But what proportion of the Volunteers are in favour of this change? What has been done to ascertain their opinion? Why, nothing. This Bill is being rushed on the Volunteers by a side wind; the failure in our military system is to be patched up, but the patch is a stolen piece of cloth. You are asking men who engaged under certain conditions to alter these conditions. Then it is said that no pressure will be put on the Volunteers, but I should like to know what would be thought of any man who holds back when the majority of his regiment are prepared to enlarge their liability for service. He would be looked upon as a man lacking in patriotism. That is not a fair position to place a man in who joins the Volunteer force under the impression that he is doing a patriotic act, but whose occupation and social relations are such as would not enable him to come forward. Then again, by introducing this system great damage is inflicted on recruiting for the Regular Army. Under the proposed system would not any man enter the Volunteers rather than the Regular Army? He will have the comfort and convenience of living at home and following his own occupation, and when there is an opportunity for service he will be placed absolutely on a level with the man who has spent all his time in the Regular Army, very often on objectionable garrison duty. I think it is most unfair, and that it will be a failure in recruiting for the Regular Army. The hon. Member for West Belfast is not as anxious with reference to the Volunteers as I am regarding the military system of the country as a whole. We have reason to hope that on the conclusion of the war our entire military system will be recast; therefore there is no necessity at the present moment to introduce this wretched measure, which will only give 5,000 or 10,000 men outside on whom you can draw in an emergency. Then, again, you will divide the classes in the Volunteers, which will ensure every military man will be liable to go away by giving a few days' notice—he will not be looked upon as a soldier at all—second, the man will be liable to be called out on active service at any time; and, third, the man will be liable to serve in any part of the Empire whether within or without Her Majesty's dominions. In fact, you are introducing into the Volunteers a system which now exists in the Army—of robbing Peter to pay Paul; cutting off the end of the blanket and putting it on to the top, but you will not get any man more. Every commanding officer of Militia is at the present moment receiving his complaints that his best men are taken from him as they are trained, and are sent to form a linked battalion abroad, or that he recruits as soon as they are effaced and drafted to other battalions in Africa. The result of this measure will be to stop recruiting for the Regular Army. With regard to the political aspect, the hon. Member for West Belfast has pointed out the results which will follow in the event of a member of a Volunteer force being asked to go to fight in what might be, on the whole, an unpopular war. The system proposed in the Bill reminds one of the system which prevails in certain Irish parishes where, when a particular duty it is to do a particular class of work, fails, another servant whose are altogether different is called in to act, and the result is, of course, blank failure. The basis of the Volunteer Bill of 1895 was to disturb as far as possible the conditions under which the Volunteers were then serving the State; but this Bill goes, as it were, to the very teeth of that policy, and is carried in such a manner as to disturb the conditions on which the Volunteer system was formed. The Bill will secure the purpose and may ruin our existing Volunteer system, and for these reasons I beg to second the motion of the hon. Member for West Belfast.

Amendment proposed—

to leave out the word 'now,' and at the same time to add the words 'upon the Question to add the words 'upon delay three months.' — (Mr. Arnold.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is not very often I have the good fortune to agree with the hon. Member for West Belfast in our discussions on these matters, and even to-day I cannot say that I sympathise with every word he has uttered, but with his main position in regard to this Bill, I am entirely in sympathy. The hon. Member for West Belfast brought up a sort of self-denying ordinance, supposed to be imposed on us, that we were not, during the present session, while military affairs were in so urgent a condition as they have been, to enter upon the much larger questions of future organisation and future reform. I think there is a good deal of strength in the position which the hon. Gentleman has taken up, even in that limited sense; but there is another and larger ground on which I think that this is a most inexpedient occasion for us to begin with piecemeal alterations in the innermost constitution of the different branches of the defensive forces of this country. The Under Secretary referred to some words I used a day or two ago protesting against doing anything in a hurry, and he argued that this Bill was intended to avoid things being done in a hurry—that is to say, that administrative acts would not be accomplished in so scrambling a fashion as was necessary last winter if this Bill were passed. That is quite possible; but I had reference to the action of the Government, of the House, and of Parliament when I spoke of not doing anything in a hurry, and I think I am supported in my view by some words which fell from the Secretary of State for War last night in another place. The Secretary of State was meeting a demand on the part of a noble Duke for the reorganisation and reconstitution of the Army and the War Office, and among the other pleas he urged was this—that there are now in South Africa a number of the very men whom it would be most essential that we should consult if it were found necessary to enter upon any change on a great scale, and that we ought to wait until we could get the great benefit of the actual experience and wise advice of those who have seen the operation of the present system in the field. I put that very wise sentiment and warning of the Secretary of State in another place against himself or his representative in this House, and I say that I think the present time is not the moment in which to make great changes, even if those changes can be shown to be salutary and wise in themselves. The House and the country have shown themselves, during the last eight or nine months, willing to do and to agree to anything that the Government proposed to meet the emergency that has arisen; but from that disposition on the part of the House, which is a loyal and wise and, I think, a most discreet disposition, to pass to the idea that the experience of last winter is to form a basis of all we are to do for the Army in the future, that that is to be considered as representing the normal requirements in any case of war of the British Army, is to take a step which I do not think anything in the world can justify. We have had to meet a most exceptional enemy, such as may not be met with in any other part of the world, as we all know. We had to meet that enemy in a great state of unpreparedness, because we, the Government, Parliament, and people, had undervalued the difficulty of the task we took in hand, and, therefore, we were put to great straits last winter, and we had to take hold of any man who offered himself and put him into some place in order to take advantage of his patriotic and generous spirit. But it does not follow that on a future occasion we should be exposed to any such necessity, because if you are to pursue a policy of expansion all over the world, we have had a lesson during the last two or three months which shows the sort of force we should have to maintain in order to cope with that policy of expansion; but if, on the other hand, we are to pursue a more modest and, as I think, more reasonable policy, let us hope that such necessities as occurred last winter will not arise again. I do not wish to prejudice the great question of the condition of the Army and the military necessities of the country. I do not say it will not be necessary to make great changes and to make great additions to our military strength. It is quite possible that that may be so, but we are not in a position now to deal with that question, and that is what I wish to urge on the House. We have a limited experience in the emergency of last winter, and upon that experience alone we are now called upon, as I think, to fundamentally alter the whole condition and spirit of the Volunteer force. There was another thing which happened during last winter. I have said our enemy was an unusual enemy in his fighting qualities, and the necessities, therefore, that were laid upon us in the circumstances were unusual. But another thing that was unusual was the remarkable and most laudable effort that was made by the employers of labour to meet the wants that were shown in our military defences. Men were allowed to go away on terms which were freely offered throughout the country. But can we be sure that similar terms will be offered in future? Can we be sure that the circumstances that occurred last winter will not seriously affect the relations between the civil employer and the Reserve man, the Militiaman and the Volunteer? I do not wish to be a Cassandra, and say that that will happen; but, at all events, we must bear in mind that the sudden emergency of last winter evoked a spirit of self-sacrifice and of patriotism which may not always be preserved at the same pitch in time of peace. The Under Secretary has also laid his case partly upon the Report of the Committee which sat a few years ago. But I notice that in the recommendations of the Committee there is not a word about foreign service for Volunteers. There is a reference to active service, but not to foreign service.

MR. WYNDHAM: I hope I did not convey the impression that I quoted the Report in support of foreign service. On the other hand, I divided, as clearly as I could, the first half of the section from the second part of the section.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Then the hon. Gentleman does not call in question the authority of the Committee in support of the second section!

MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir.

*SIR HENRY FLETCHER (St. Leonards): As a member of that Committee, perhaps I may be allowed to say that I had no instructions whatever to call in question the question of foreign service.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This Committee made its report, and immediately afterwards a Bill was introduced into the House carrying out the recommendations as far as they could be carried out, amending the law for and out the Volunteers for actual military service. So that it is not the case that nothing has been done to meet the wishes of the Committee.

MR. WYNDHAM: I pointed out to the Chairman of that Committee, in debate on that very Bill, recognising the recommendations of the Committee had not been carried out in their entirety. He said he hoped they would not be taken out of sight of, and joined with those who regarded the Bill simply as an instalment. Some of the prominent members of the Committee expressed the greatest regret that the Bill brought in by the right hon. Gentleman did not include the recommendations of the Committee.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am sure that the Bill embodied the suggestions of the Committee, and commended themselves to those who were best acquainted with the needs and the necessities of the Volunteer corps in their administrative relations with the War Office. I am also sure of this, that the suggestions of the Committee, in a case like that, necessarily involve their recognition and adoption by the Government of the day, or by Parliament. The Committee formed, for the most part, of strong, energetic Volunteers, who, no doubt, were anxious to see certain changes introduced, but it does not follow that the wishes of a few colonels of Volunteer corps, ever eminent and zealous, must carry the day. We are bound to look at the question of this kind from the civilian as well as from the Volunteer point of view.

WYNDHAM: The Chairman, the Social Secretary to the War Office, wasilian.

H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: ; but at any rate a Committee not convey such overpowering weight e must accept its opinions without tion. Even Royal Commissions to into military matters are sometimes d to but little attention; and we had one or two Royal Commissions the licensing question whose Reports been received with nothing but and contumely from the supporters the Government. So that I really the authority of the Committee can rried too far; and the House is per-free to act in this matter without ommendations of the Committee. hon. Gentleman adduced one or two es in which changes are necessary, ut chiefly with regard to the first use; I mean the question of Volunteer illery manning the forts which defend e commercial harbours of this country, e submarine mines, and so forth. That true, and it may be a very necessary ing to take such steps as may be re-quired to give them more ample time an other branches of the Volunteer service for preparation for the efficient fulfilment of the duties imposed upon them. But surely that does not justify sweeping changes of this kind which will affect all the Volunteer corps throughout the kingdom. The Volunteer forces were originally instituted for the purpose of the defence of these shores; they have always been treated as a force originated and intended for that purpose, and they have been spoken of in our after-dinner speeches, even when we are most effusive, under that limitation. Is there any one of us who has not, after dinner, declared that "Defence, not defiance," is the motto of the Volunteers? And, as my hon. friend has said, if in vino veritas has any force, then after dinner is the very time when we get at the kernel of the matter. The Volunteers were instituted, and they have been maintained, for the defence of these islands. But the Government now propose to introduce three separate classes into the Volunteers. There are those who only undertake the old duties; there are those who undertake the liability of being called out for actual military service at any time; and there are those who may be called out to serve in any part of the world. I agree with what has been said, that it is most undesirable to have two or three kinds of men serving in the same corps with different liabilities, if it can be at all avoided. There may be instances where there is a limited necessity for cases of that kind, such as the Militia reserve; but I always thought that the Army was against the Militia reserve, because its effect upon the Army might be bad. It was, however, a necessity; but where was the necessity here, in order to obtain the services of a few men, of introducing a distinction among them? I have no doubt there are many high-spirited young men in the Volunteers who would be glad to undertake actual military service; but the question is, Is it desirable from a public point of view to allow them to do it and to separate them from the rest of their comrades? I do not think it is. The Under Secretary for War seemed to think he made things rather better when he went on to say that those who undertook the liability of serving in any part of the world would only be called upon to do so in the case of actual military service. "Of course," said the hon. Gentleman, "we should never think of putting them to garrison duty, or to other humdrum occupations of that kind, which would not give them the chance of winning glory and distinction. It is only in active warfare that they would obtain a knowledge of their duties; let us send them to the front." It does not occur to him to ask "What becomes of the Regular force and of the Militia?" I suppose the Militia are only to garrison forts such as Sierra Leone, while the Volunteers must be reserved for the front.

MR. WYNDHAM: I do not recognise my own arguments in the right hon. Gentleman's version of them.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I know. I am putting them purposely in an exaggerated way to show how dangerous they are. But does it not come to this: that you are to select from one force a number of high-spirited young fellows, and put them, in preference to other forces, to do certain duties of an attractive kind? They are, in fact, to be put in front of the Army and Militia Reservists. I really do not think a case for this Bill has been made out. I should be willing indeed to see the slight alteration made with regard to Section 17 of the Volunteer Act of 1863. That, of course, is a good thing, because it gets rid of the somewhat pedantic difficulty of publicity which is undesirable. I would be glad to see anything done which would really increase the utility and efficiency of the Volunteers, but I do not think the institution among them of two or three classes of men with different liabilities would mean any real or substantial increase in their efficiency. It could not increase their efficiency except in a reflex way—that these young fellows would go out and see active service and when they came back would leaven the battalion in which they serve. But we are not going to make war gaily every year in order to give fine high-spirited young fellows the opportunity of seeing active service. The Bill is founded on a wrong conception. Last winter there was a great emergency, and the hon. Gentleman seems to have been very much impressed by the wild tone of feeling shown in the public press. I do not go so much by the tone of the public press. I am sure the thinking people of the country agree that everything should be done in an emergency to meet the case. But that is a very different thing from enlisting men in one force and promptly passing them into another, so that the Army and the whole defensive force—the Militia, the Volunteers, and the Yeomanry—are so mixed up that no one can tell when you meet a man in the street to which force he belongs. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press, at all events, this clause of the Bill. This is not the time for us to be meddling with these things. We want more ample opportunities and more ample advice from those who have come through the experience of war before we attempt to tinker with our military system. For the present it is better to be content with the humbler duty of filling up the ordinary necessities of the Army in war, and to leave the reorganisation and reconstitution of it to quieter times.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): If I saw anything in this Bill which could be characterised as a fundamental change in our organised system, I should vote against it. But I do not see that. We have heard objections made that it is a fundamental change in the constitution of our voluntary service, but I cannot share that view. The Bill is simply permissive and administrative in its action. Voluntary service can now go on active service upon fourteen days' notice, and resigning a Volunteer position and enlisting in the Militia or the regular Army, and the Bill simply provides for administrative convenience in dealing with the case of Volunteers who are desirous of going on active service, and enables the War Office to know beforehand what proportion of the Volunteer force would wish to hold themselves liable for general service all over the world. I cannot conceive that there can be the slightest objection to Clause 1; it is simply an alteration that is necessary; and I cannot understand any Members of this House who have given ten minutes' thought to the question why the Volunteers are in existence, and what the work is they have to perform, can hesitate for a moment to accept it. With regard to the first part of Clause 2, which enables Volunteers to arm themselves and to hold themselves in readiness to be called upon to serve at any time, and is, for the purposes of administrative arrangements, as to the defence of our ports, it is a good principle, but where the difficulty comes in is in the sub-section B of Clause 2. Upon that point the proposer of the motion to reject the Bill and his seconder objected on two or three grounds, but to my mind they did not follow out their own arguments when they estimated the number of men likely to avail themselves of this Bill at 10,000 only, when one remembers that the Volunteer force is over a quarter of a million men. A Bill that provides for the wishes of Volunteers who desire to serve abroad is a good Bill, and I cannot think such consequences are going to happen as are suggested by the hon. Gentlemen if it only affects 3 or 4 per cent. of that force. I therefore cannot share their view. Another objection which they took was that we might have an unpopular war, and that trouble might then happen if these men were called out against their convictions to perform the obligations which they undertook; but that would also apply to the Army Reserve. I cannot see in this respect any difference between the Regular Army, Militia, Army Reserve, and the Volunteers. When a man enters into a contract with the Government he must, when called upon, put his convictions in his pocket and fulfil his contract; therefore, I cannot agree with that view. Another

tion raised was that of filling the ranks of units of the Volunteer corps hold themselves liable under this Bill for general service. I think if it is intended that for the necessities of this country 260,000 Volunteers are required for our local defences, although we may have supreme power at sea, then I say I do not acknowledge the contention and do not agree with it. If 10,000 hold themselves in readiness to go abroad, it merely adds in any case an increase of the Volunteer strength. But I think that 260,000 is more than sufficient if you have a command at sea, therefore I do not pay much attention to the objection to the arguments that I have heard in relation to this Bill. But I am bound to say that to come down here and take the Bill as it stands and give my hearty support to it is another thing. I give my hearty support to the first clause, and to that part of the second clause which enables a certain proportion of men that may be necessary to be called upon in times of emergency to hold themselves liable for service. I thoroughly accept those two points, and I was prepared to accept the third point without hesitation until I heard a remark dropped by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary, and that frightened me, and is why I now hold my vote back in respect to that part of the Bill. He said that, of course, in the case of those men who volunteer for service abroad, we should never think of asking them to do anything else but go to the front; that we should not ask them to go into garrisons or act in any disagreeable work in keeping lines of communication, etc., and that this Bill would only apply to those who held themselves liable for service, but only to go to the front, and that we should arrange for the Regulars or the Militia to do the disagreeable work. If we cannot call upon them except to go to the front, that strikes at the very root of our military system. It is not for the men to say where they will go, whether it be to the front, where all the excitement is, or at the rear, where all is dreary and the work is hard. They must do their duty, and with regard to this part of the clause I shall certainly have to vote against it, unless there is some further explanation from the hon. Gentleman. I cannot sufficiently express my feelings at the idea of making a man liable to serve as a military unit on the condition that he is only to serve at the front, and the remarks of the hon. Gentleman have actually turned my vote against this part of the Bill which I came down to support. To my mind if this Bill is passed we must be very clear as to how it is going to work. We must be exceptionally clear as to what we are doing. I think that these men, if they hold themselves liable for service, should do so without qualification, and unless that matter is cleared up I cannot vote for Sub-section B, Clause 2, of the Bill. Now, coming back to the part of the Bill of which I do approve, I cannot exactly understand why the period should be for one month. My hon. friend said, and I thought he spoke having regard to particular circumstances, that during critical negotiations when danger was imminent was not the time to call out the whole of the Volunteers; but negotiations do not end in a month; but if, for the reasons he stated, we cannot call out the whole force, he says we must be able to call out part of the force without observation or making a scare. But why limit it to a month? A period arrives in negotiations when it becomes necessary for the Government in its discretion to say. We must look to the safety of our ports and call out these men, but at the end of the month negotiations are going on still, and at the end of the month the Government will have to disband these men or mobilise the whole of the force. It is the Memorandum of the hon. Gentleman which frightens me. We are told distinctly that at present we should have to call out the whole force, and naturally that would be a difficult thing to do; therefore the Government must have power to call out a portion of the men, but why limit it to a month? That is against the proposal of the Government. A month is not in the Bill, but we have been supplied with the draft of the proposed Volunteer regulations. If my hon. friend tells me the Government are not bound by that term, but can keep these men, when called out, as long as they like, my objection falls. Now we have obtained information on many points, but in one particular that information is lacking. We lack information as to what is the period for which a Volunteer is to be liable after he has accepted the obligation. I can find nothing in the Bill at all with regard to that. I see it says between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five. Does that mean that a man of thirty-four years of age, having had two years training in the Volunteers, can be accepted under this Bill, and, if so, for how long? I think the Bill in principle is perfectly sound to this extent, that it is an attempt to retrieve the past errors of our military system. We have now for forty years been acting on the principle that we must have a vast number of armed men in this country to guard against the danger of an invasion, and upon that force we have spent a vast sum of money, the result being that we have spent this vast amount upon a principle which is the absolute negation of our naval supremacy. It is an attempt to get the men of this secondary force, which is not wanted here, to hold themselves in readiness for over-sea service. I do not see that the allegation that it is an interference with the Volunteer Act has the shadow of a foundation. I am prepared to vote for the whole of the Bill with the exception of Sub-section B of Clause 2, which I cannot vote for.

*MR. HEDDERWICK said that this Bill raised grave issues and reflections. In spite of what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, to whose opinion on matters of this kind he attached the greatest possible respect, he thought that the Bill, if passed, would have a profound effect upon the character of the Volunteer force. If the Government asked the Volunteers upon enrolment whether they were willing to serve abroad, if need be, they would immediately divide the Volunteer force into two classes, those who preferred to stay at home and those who were willing to serve abroad, and the result in time would inevitably be that a very large proportion of the youth of the country who would gladly, under present conditions, join the force, but who could not tell what their position would be in a few years, would be prevented from joining the Volunteers. If, on the other hand, the Government did not intend to put that question upon enrolment, but were prepared to leave it until the emergency arose, then the force of that objection he admitted would be greatly diminished. The hon. Member for Yarmouth had said truly that in a Bill of this kind we ought to be very clear as to what we were going to do. It appeared to him that it was impossible for the House to take such an intelligent view of the result of their action if they adopted the Bill, for a reason which he commended to the consideration of the hon. and gallant Member. The terms of the contract under which the Volunteers were to be taken, it was essential that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary should be clear as to what steps were to be taken, it was essential that the terms of the contract, which were of great importance, should be stated in the Bill itself. On those grounds he thought the House was not in a position to pass adequately what would be the effect of proposals of the Government. By giving the Bill the House would in effect be giving a blank cheque to the War Office. Another point which forced itself upon his mind was this. He could not see why a Bill of such far-reaching importance should be brought in at a late period of the session. It emanated from the War Office in an emergency in the Transvaal, but the emergency had passed away so far as the volunteer service was concerned. He was with the hon. Member for Westbury that if anything was going to be done to reform the military system of this country this was not the way to commence. It should begin with the War Office. If everybody agreed required reform, instead of adopting that reasonable course, the Government appeared to be setting up the Volunteers as a last resort. He was surprised that the hon. Gentleman, who was familiar with military matters, should quote the words of sixteen Volunteer colonels as a sufficient defence or justification for such a Bill. Upon those grounds alone, he felt himself compelled to oppose the Bill.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Warminster) said that with regard to a great portion of the Bill there was no agreement, but there was one point with which he could not agree, and that was the part which asked the Volunteers to serve in any part of the world, or without Her Majesty's dominions. His objection to it was owing to the opinion of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary. The Volunteers were a home defence, and if home defence was weakened the Government would be wrong. Under the present system, if any of the Volunteers desired to go abroad there was nothing to prevent them. Everybody who knew a the War Office was aware that a war occurred there was an immense strain put upon the War Office because of the want of organisation, and he did not think that the reform of that department should be postponed. He thought a great portion of the Bill would be very useful, and he supported the second Reading with the hope that the Government would see their way to amplify Sub-section B of Clause 2. He agreed with the hon. Member for Wick, who declined to give the Government a blank cheque, and thought that the Government ought to know what they were going to do. There was one thing to be guarded against, which was the jealousy which would give rise to between the Volunteers and the Militia. All the forces ought to work harmoniously for the good of the country, and great care ought to be taken that there should be no petty jealousy between them.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire) desired to add a few words in support of the objections which had been raised to the Bill. It was a remarkable fact that the support which had been given to the measure was of the most qualified description; but everybody agreed that it was unfortunate that the Bill should have been brought forward at so inopportune a time. There appeared to be a consensus of opinion that at the time when the country had made great efforts in connection with the South African war the judgment of the House was not sufficiently unbiassed to deal with this matter. But the Bill was inopportune for another reason. The whole country had already made great sacrifices, and it did not seem to be appropriate that this particular time should be chosen by the Government to introduce a measure which would increase the burden of the Volunteer military service. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary, perhaps, would meet that criticism and justify his action by saying that the Government had taken every step possible for them to take, and that they had consulted well-known persons upon the subject. Sixteen officers had been consulted; but surely a very much larger consultation was required in a matter of this kind. It was necessary to get in touch with many more regiments throughout the country, and those civilians who were connected with our military service in some way or other, and not only those but the whole civil population. Further time and further inquiry were necessary before any organic change was made in the Volunteer law. The Under Secretary for War had, in meeting the criticisms in the administration of the War Office, said that any organic change could not be expected to be taken at present. That was the view taken by the greater portion of the country. There were many important lessons to be learnt from a war like this. Any declaration of that kind which had been made would not seem to justify the Government in bringing forward this Bill or any other measure of a similar character. As no objection had been raised to Clause 1 he did not know that he need trouble the House with any observations upon it, but he expressed a wish to be informed as to whether the Volunteer Act of 1895, which gave power to the Government to call out a portion of the Volunteer force upon the embodiment of the Militia, did not meet all the necessities of the case. Great stress had been laid upon the fact of the Government being able to move certain bodies of men in case of an emergency or conflict with any other Powers; but before moving the Volunteers surely the preliminary step of embodying the Militia would be taken. And, if so, the Volunteers could be moved under the present law after the Militia had been embodied. Why were these new powers needed in respect to Clause 1? The Bill struck at the root of our present system. In the beginning of the year large bodies of Volunteers had been sent over the seas, and that had left the country insufficiently protected, and now the Government had introduced a measure designed to place more men at their disposal in case of emergency—that was the effect of it, whatever might have been the intention—it placed more men at the disposal of the Government for any action which they might take abroad. A great deal had been heard about Empire during the present year, but let not the House forget the nation, and that home defence was, after all, one of the most responsible and essential parts of our organisation. This scheme of the Government cut into the scheme of home defence and weakened the country in its most vital part. If it was necessary to increase the military force, how was it that nothing had been heard of that intermediate force, the Militia? The present Bill merely laid new burdens on the backs of the Volunteers, and trenched on the resources of the country for home defence. The Government on the question of raising men for foreign service had passed over the Militia and gone to the Volunteers. He hoped as the result of the discussion the Bill would not be proceeded with at this time.

MR. SEELY (Lincoln) thought that although the Government had been wise to raise this question they would best serve the interests of the country and the Volunteers by not proceeding further with the Bill now. With regard to the first section, it was a very strong thing to alter the conditions of service of 250,000 men in time of war, and although the Government said they did not intend to call out such a number, still, this Bill made a considerable difference in the law. It might be used in future in a very different manner from that in which the original words could be used, and for a different purpose than that for which the Volunteers originally engaged. Therefore, it was incumbent on the Government to make it perfectly clear that such a step was necessary, not simply for administrative convenience, but for the defence of the country. He did not think in that case the country would object, but it was necessary that such an assurance should be given. He should like to know how many Volunteers offered themselves for garrison duty at the beginning of the year, and whether the reason that their services were not accepted was to be found in the legal difficulty, or whether the reason was that their services were not required. If such a difficulty existed, the first clause of the Bill was a necessity, but if not the proposed alteration ought to be very carefully considered. It seemed very like mixing up the duties of the Volunteers and the Militia. He always thought the Volunteers were regarded as for home defence, but the fact did not appear to be appreciated by the Government. As to Clause 2, the Government would probably see the wisdom of withdrawing it for the present. There was a great deal to be said against it; and if the Government wanted men from the Volunteers there would never be any difficulty in getting them. As to the "scandal of the scramble" in the beginning of the year, that could never be avoided by any alteration of the terms of service when the Government entered upon a war with the idea that they only needed 70,000 men, and then suddenly discovered that at least 230,000 would be required. He hoped the Under Secretary would ask the House as to the point he had made, and would consider very carefully the questions raised on the sub-section.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said he should not have intervened in the debate except for the fact that he sat upon the Committee which was proposed to have supported the Bill. He wished to draw attention to two points. The first was the liability of the Volunteers to be called out in times of national danger. If it was admitted it was necessary to call out the Volunteers, a man might be able to get a month of his time, but he could not get the whole year without considering his prospects. At one time he thought that no man ought to become a soldier unless he came under military law, but in South Africa it had been amply proved that a man could do a great deal of fighting without ever having come under military law. A great proportion of the Volunteer force were well trained as soldiers. He had seen many Volunteer corps for both short periods in camps, and he had seen a good deal of Army training, and he had come to the conclusion that unless men came under military law, they could not be depended upon. One brigade of Volunteers he had seen manœuvring on a very exhausting field day, and they did perfectly well up to a point, but at mid-day the Volunteers began to get tired and sat down, as they said they were far enough, and there was no more to be done. For this reason he thought that the recommendations of the Committee as embodied in the Bill would be beneficial to the force. It was this point against it: that the unpleasant conditions were in the Bill would mean that fewer men would come, although the smaller force might be more efficient. The Bill in this question was the liability to be called out for service. He believed that it would be injurious to the Volunteer force to have the effect of dividing the corps into three sections, each unit requiring a separate officer to be efficient. This foreign service ought to be applied to the Mil-

applied to the Volunteers. The Bill should be the second line of defence of the Volunteers the third. It would have an injurious effect upon recruitment. Another reason why this clause should be passed was the absurdity of it. The Government had proved that for themselves. In the earlier part of the year, when they asked for Volunteers for general service they had as many men as required, and if this Clause 2 had been the law it would not help them to get more. The second clause was so objectionable that it ought to be taken out of the Bill. The Bill was a very important one, but it would be wise on the part of the Government to reconsider their position as to passing it this session. At the present moment all the great leaders were in South Africa, and all the War Office authorities were engaged in work in connection with South Africa, or ought to be; and when a radical change of this character was going to be made the whole of those people ought to be consulted. If that was not necessary, why were not the War Office reforms carried out that were so much required? The whole system had broken down and had not worked smoothly, although it had done a good deal more than it was expected it would do. The Government were ready to tinker up the Volunteers, but were not ready to undertake real reforms with regard to the War Office, because it was said that all the important people were away. Was not this Bill a part of the reform? Yet this Bill was to be passed without delay. The moment the war was over the recruiting for the Army would fall so low that they would have difficulty in getting men. He thought that before anyone who had the good of the Volunteer force at heart could honestly support the Bill, the Government ought to give a pledge that they would limit Sub-section (a) of Clause 2 to service in Great Britain and Ireland. If they did so, most of the mischief would be taken out of the Bill.

MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. and gallant Member who spoke last is in favour of the passing of the Second Reading of this Bill. He shares the opinion of my hon. friend the Member for Lincoln that to remove the public declaration as to the apprehension of invasion is to destroy the Volunteer force as an instrument for defence. We are all agreed about that. He concluded his speech by saying that if the Government would give a pledge that the men who offered for service under Sub-section (a) of Clause 2 were only to serve in Great Britain, he would support that.

MR. WARNER: May I make a correction? I did not say only to serve in Great Britain, but I said only to undertake the condition of being liable to be called out for service in Great Britain.

MR. WYNDHAM: I think that follows ipso facto on the Bill. I must say it has given me the greatest satisfaction to find that there is almost a unanimous assent to the two important objects of the Bill, which I described in my speech. The third object of the Bill has been much criticised, and naturally criticised, for I admit it is a novelty. I draw a clear distinction between the two main objects and the third object, which I have described as a matter not so much of importance as of method and convenience. I still hold to my own opinion that something must be done to avoid in future what I call the scandal of the scramble which took place in January. It is clear that we ought to think out these things in time of peace, and arrive at a businesslike and smooth form to be employed in time of war. Of course, I cannot claim that the third object is one of anything like the urgency of the first two propositions. That being so, I am not going to enter into an elaborate reply to arguments which rest on the fallacy that I attach great importance to this proposal for the purpose of getting a Reserve for the Army. That is not so. But as I think there is force in the argument that we should wait for the return of the Volunteers who have gone out to the Cape before we invite Volunteers, as we do in Sub-section (b) to subject themselves to liability "to serve in any part of the world, whether within or without Her Majesty's dominions," the Government will not press that Sub-section. As regards Sub-section (a) the liability "to be called out for actual military service at any time," we propose to limit that to the United Kingdom. With those modifications, I ask the House to agree to the second reading.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Let us understand exactly where we are. I understand that the hon. Gentleman implies that Sub-section (b) of Clause 2 will not be pressed. But what about Sub-section (a)—will it be pressed?

MR. WYNDHAM; Yes.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In the broad sense in which it stands they may be called out for military service at any time.

MR. WYNDHAM: I endeavoured in my speech this morning to show that you could not modify the provision in the Volunteer Act unless by using general terms, and that then under those terms you could issue restrictive regulations. That is the way in which it should be done, and I humbly submit, if the right hon. Gentleman will allow me, that the point could be argued more conveniently in Committee if we are agreed on the object.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is an important object, I admit. I hope the Government will consider whether it requires such a sweeping phrase as this, that all the Volunteers everywhere are to be subject to be called out for service at any time. I think that is an alarming proposition.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am quite willing to argue that point in Committee.

*SIR HENRY FLETCHER: I have listened to this debate in a double position—as having been a member of the Committee which has been alluded to, and which sat six years ago, and also as having served in Her Majesty's Volunteer force since 1859. I do hope the House will accept the explanation of the hon. Gentleman, and allow the Bill to be read a second time, leaving out those parts he has alluded to. I can assure the House that I did not intend to take any part in the debate until I heard the explanation that has just been given by my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War. I felt that the sub-section designated (b) in Clause 2 could not receive the support of those who had the interest of the Volunteer force at heart. Now, owing to the explanation given to us, I feel relieved in my mind, and I consider that what is proposed to be done will be not only for the benefit of the Volunteers, but also for the benefit of the country at large.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): I wish to call attention to one feature of Sub-section (a), to which my hon. friend thinks he has received the assent of the House. I shall confine myself entirely to Sub-section (a). What the Government want to understand, is to be able to call out Volunteers for military service at any time. They cannot do that under the present Act, and they propose to get over the difficulty by saying that Volunteers shall come under an obligation to be called out for actual military service at any time. Objection has been taken to that, because it is felt that it classifies Volunteers. I agree with those who say that it is extremely objectionable that our civic force we should have some men who have a liability different from others. I want to submit to my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War whether the object of the Government would not be met by so altering the law that the Government may accept the services of Volunteers at any time without placing anyone under previous obligation to give them. In the moment of emergency you want a number of men. As the Bill now stands you can accept those men who are under previous liability to join. Surely there is no objection in that. The proposal is on the objection that you classify the Volunteers in two separate sections. I suggest that you should alter the Bill as to give the Government power to accept the services of Volunteers if they choose. You would then have the law intact as it is at present, and at the same time open wide the door for them to give their services in time of emergency. I am persuaded that that would be a better and more popular reform to carry out in this direction. I would urge my friend to consider the aspect of the question I have just now alluded to.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester) asked whether in the event of Sub-section (a) of Clause 2 becoming law, p. 10, Volunteers would require to be enlisted.

MR. WYNDHAM: That is not the case. They do not enlist. They enrol.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton) asked whether there would be any provision for a Volunteer taking himself out of the Bill by giving certain notice.

MR. WYNDHAM: Certainly.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfar) asked whether it was or was not the case that the passing of Clause 2 of the Bill would impose fresh obligations upon Volunteers now serving.

the case that it would not be binding on them unless they were willing to enter into these new obligations?

WYNDHAM: I cannot go into questions on the Second Reading.

HENRY FOWLER (Wolverton, E.) said it was a question whether should not press this to a division if did not clearly understand the intention of the Government. What he understood was that Sub-section (a) of Clause 2 should be confined to the United Kingdom, and, secondly, that the hon. Gentleman dropped Sub-section (b) altogether. It was not open to argument.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said he should like to know from the Under-Secretary for War in what way the contract of the Volunteers was to be given, whether it would be by individual contract or by the colonel commanding. Would it be possible, for example, for the colonel of a Volunteer battalion to call out his 800 men on parade, and, after an ultra-patriotic speech, say, "Now, all you men who are willing to go on active service march to the front"—the effect being to make all the men who stay behind to appear more or less unpatriotic or cowardly?

MR. WYNDHAM: Assuredly not. There will be a separate contract with each individual man. If the House will allow the Second Reading to-day I shall deal with all these points in Committee.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

RESERVE FORCES BILL [Lords].

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WYNDHAM: I think there need be very few words said in moving the Second Reading of this Bill. It has two objects. In the first place, it will abolish the present restrictions in the use of the supplemental section of the Army Reserve. At present, under the Reserve Forces Act of 1882, Reservists of a certain category can only be got at when the whole of Sections B and C have been exhausted. Many difficulties arising out of that division have been revealed during the war. In the first place, on 20th December we had to call out 8,000 men of Sections B and C who were not needed. I think the House will see that that is very hard on everybody. It is hard on the taxpayer, who has to pay the man full pay when he is not doing full work; it is hard on the Reservist, who has, perhaps, thrown up his employment and is not wanted but sent back; it is hard on his wife, whose arrangements are dislocated by receiving separation allowance for a few days and then the allowance ceasing; it is hard on the charitable associations which have come forward with such humanity to assist in these matters; and it is hard on the officer in charge of the mobilisation, who, at a time when the depôt is already clogged with men, has to deal with additional men for whom he has no need; and it is hard on regimental tradition. I think that, while preserving the principle that we should take the men who last left the Army first, we ought to apply that principle to regiments and not to the whole of the Reserve. If you want a few Reservists you fall back on the men who left a year ago, and, if you want more, you take the men who left two years ago.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Wyndham.)

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think the main object of this Bill is one that can be accepted. There is only one point that I am doubtful about, and it is a humble and sordid question. There are two classes of men who have different obligations. One class get 6d. a day and the other class get 4d. a day. Supposing I have served in a regiment in which you have a great many sixpenny men, and I personally am not called upon until you have exhausted all the sixpenny men in the other regiment, is there not a danger of injustice being done in dealing with the two classes? I am afraid that is an important omission from the statement. We should have, of course, to give sixpence in every case, and a proper check on the number under Sub-section (b) would be only to pass men into that section who are efficient. I believe the proper way to keep it within limits is by raising the standard and paying the reserve properly.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR asked whether this Bill did not involve the placing of an increased charge upon the expenditure of the country.

MR. WYNDHAM: No, I do not think that follows at all. That is a question that will be debated when the Estimates come on. It depends on the policy of the Government of the day—whether they wish to have many or few.

MR. WARNER said he presumed that the 4d. men were to have 6d., and that would mean an increase on the cost of the Reserve, unless they reduced the total number. He did not suppose that this or any Government was likely to reduce the number of the Reserve. He thought the country was ready to meet the small increased expenditure on the Reserve, looking to the magnificent way they succeeded in filling up the regiments.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

POST OFFICE SITES (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1:—

Question again proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) said there were two points in the clause to which he wished to refer. The first was with regard to Sub-section (a). When the Secretary of the Treasury looked at the reasonableness of the proposal he had to submit he did not think the right hon. Gentleman would consider there was any ground whatever for making an exception in the case of the Post Office. The Land Clauses Act very properly prescribed that where an undertaking would change the character of the land, the same land tax and poor-rate as before should be paid from the time of demolition until the property could be rated again in the ordinary way, and he saw no reason for exempting the Post Office from the operation of this principle. That was a reasonable position, and he hoped it would commend itself to the Secretary of the Treasury. Of course they could not take it out of the clause at the present moment, but the right hon. Gentleman might give them an assurance that the point would be considered in another place. With regard to the sub-section which provided that claims for compensation by leaseholders from year to year or by leaseholders during unexpired terms of not more than eighteen months to run should be determined under Section 121 of the Land Clauses Act, 1845, he pointed out that that section only referred to those cases from year to year, and he wished to know why it had been thus extended.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HANBURY, London): The hon. Member has perfectly correctly stated the law under the Land Clauses Act. The law is that in the case of demolition of buildings the same land tax and the same poor-rate are to be paid as were paid before the demolition took place, and should continue to be paid until the new buildings are erected. If the land tax is paid to the Government, and it is absurd to say that the Government should pay the land tax to the ratepayer, there is no necessity to pay that tax at all. As to the poor-rate, I agree that the Government ought to go on paying the same poor-rate, but, at any rate, in this case, the Government is not liable to pay rates at all, and the words of which the hon. Member complains are simply inserted to protect that right of the Crown. That having been done, I agree that the practice of paying on the same basis as other ratepayers should be adopted, and I will undertake to see that the principle is adopted in this case. The object of introducing leaseholders with not more than eighteen months to run into the other sub-section is to save legal expenses. The Government consider that a leaseholder with no greater interest than that is practically in the same position as a yearly tenant.

MR. WARNER said the principle had now been conceded that the Government were to pay rates like other people.

MR. HANBURY: The hon. Member is entirely mistaken. We do not pay rates the same as other people. The Government has its own valuer, and if we were to strike out the words regarding the poor rate in this case we should depart from our universal rule of having our own valuer.

MR. WARNER said it was not a serious thing whether the valuer was paid by the Government or the district. He thought his hon. friend was justified in raising this question.

JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockport) said the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury was rather inconsistent, for this was the first time he had said in reference to the land that it was a case of the Government rating the tax to the Government, but in the case of the Post Office it was not so. This Bill was introduced by the Postmaster General. The Post Office was a remunerative Department of the State, and the Post Office was rated upon to pay taxes at all should be like other business concerns the taxes upon the property it owned. If the Post Office were run by a private company they would be liable for this tax. Therefore he thought the argument of the right hon. Gentleman was very weak. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman argued in a different sense some time ago. If a corporation owned gas or water works the rates upon the undertakings were paid over to the corporation. It should be the same with the Government Department making about £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 a year. It was unfair that they should demolish buildings in any locality, and that they should for the time being withdraw from the locality the rates which would have been payable on the buildings demolished. He thought the Government got off very cheaply indeed with reference to rates. He held in his hand the last Return issued to the House by the right hon. Gentleman. Anyone reading the Return and knowing the buildings in the different towns would see that the buildings were rated far below their value, and did not contribute to the local rates what they ought to pay. He thought, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman ought to give a pledge that he would consider this subject with the view of having the law changed, so that this State Department, like any other Department, private individual, or company in the country should be held responsible for the rates and taxes it was entitled to pay.

MR. RECKITT (Lincolnshire, Brigg): It may interest the House in connection with this subject to know upon what basis the valuer for the Post Office assesses the value for rating purposes, because there are a variety of different rules of assessment throughout the country, so that what is a perfectly fair assessment in one locality may be a very unfair one in another. If you have a hard and fast system you may have a post office in one county properly rated by the contribution paid by the Department to the local authority, while in the very next county you may find that the assessment put on by the Government officials is ridiculously disproportionate to the general assessment of other property in the same place. I think the time has come when the Post Office should allow the assessments to be made by the locality, and if the Government still maintain the position that they are not compelled to pay rates, but are willing to make a grant in lieu of rates, that grant should approximate to the assessment made by the local assessment committee. If that were done a great deal of friction and ill-feeling would be removed.

MR. CALDWELL was surprised that the Secretary to the Treasury had not given a more favourable answer. This was not a question of the local or the Government valuers; the amount was fixed by the statute and not by the valuator at all. The question of valuation did not enter into the matter; it was simply a question of justice to the poor rate authority. The object of the law was to protect everybody whose interest was affected, and the poor rate interest was here undoubtedly affected. It was astonishing that the Secretary to the Treasury did not see the difference between the question of the rating of Government property generally, and this question of protecting the interest of the poor rate. Nothing could be more reasonable than that a Government Department should in this respect be put in the same position as any other undertaking, but here Government property was to be treated quite differently.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Mr. Caldwell and Mr.
 Jonathan Samuel.

MR. CALDWELL pointed out that this was nominally a Government Bill, it was really a private Bill. It was therefore, necessary that the plans and books of reference should be put in the Tea-room or elsewhere in such a way that those interested in the various constituencies affected might have an opportunity of seeing the plans, and knowing fully what were the proposed alterations. In this particular case, a number of rights-of-way were to be closed, but it was a very peculiar thing that, so far as the Corporation of London was concerned, great care was taken that no right-of-way should be shut up there. He wished for an assurance that in future, when the House was practically considering Bills of this character in Committee, plans should be placed in the Tea-room, so that any Member in whose constituency the proposed compulsory powers were to be granted might have an opportunity of seeing whether local interests were affected by the Bill.

MR. HANBURY pointed out that this was practically an unopposed Bill, and Members had had an opportunity of seeing the plans and books of reference. It did not occur in the case of ordinary unopposed Bills.

MR. CALDWELL asked why the Committee should be dealing with the Bill clause by clause and line by line if it had been dealt with upstairs. The position was altogether different from that of a Bill brought on an unopposed private Bill. The form was to be kept up of making the House responsible for the wording of the Bill by passing the measure through the House sitting as a Committee, and Members ought to have the materials for doing their duty properly. He, therefore, thought the assurance for which he had asked ought to be given.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): I think there is something to be said for the demand of my hon. friend. At any rate, I rise to ask the right hon. Gentleman to give an assurance of some sort that local opinion will be consulted in the future when land is to be taken for Post Office purposes. In my own constituency land has been purchased, but no heed whatever has been paid to local opinion. A position has been selected which, in my judgment and in the judgment of the mercantile community, is altogether a wrong one. Instead of being in the centre of the town it is some distance away, and no notice whatever was taken of the representations of the most representative bodies in the constituency. The plan suggested by my hon. friend is a most reasonable one, and for the life of me I cannot understand why the assurance asked for should be refused. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill is always ready to meet representatives, hear their views, and as far as possible to consult them, but unfortunately the right hon. Gentleman is not the supreme authority in connection with the matter. I wish he were, as probably then there would not be so much opposition to these matters. I think we are entitled to have the assurance that where lands are to be bought the greatest possible care should be taken to consult local opinion, and that the opportunity should be given for Members interested to see exactly what is intended to be done with regard to post offices in their constituencies.

MR. HANBURY said that no doubt in the case of a Bill such as that under consideration where the purchase was one of property by the Government it was a little different from that of an ordinary Railway Bill. He would therefore consult those who advised him in these matters and see whether there would be any objection to allowing the plans in future to be placed in the Tea-room. He could not himself see why there should be any great objection, and if possible it should be done.

MR. JOHN BURNS: The right hon. Gentleman has consented to do what two or three years ago the Chief Commissioner of Works promised to do in relation to other Government buildings. I wish to support the remarks of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy by giving an illustration. Three or four years ago I made representations to the Chief Commissioner of Works that wherever a post office was to be erected, the local authority should be consulted, not only as to the site, but upon all matters relating to the position of public buildings in relation to other buildings in the town. For instance, it sometimes happens that the Postmaster General is advised that a post office should project eight or ten feet beyond the line of frontage of adjacent buildings, and the local authorities very properly resent that. Government buildings ought to comply with the local authority's regulations as to line of frontage, sewage, drainage, and sanitation. If the right hon. Gentleman will consult the First Commissioner of Works, he will find that three years ago he promised that whenever a post office was to be erected in London, before the site was finally determined upon the line of frontage should be submitted to the local Building Act authority, and that their regulations should be complied with. I would respectfully suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should carry out that promise of three years ago. In the clause under discussion, as in Clauses 6 and 7, the City Corporation is selected for special reference, and to that particular body extraordinary deference is shown. I would advise the right hon. Gentleman to cut out the references to any particular city, and say that whenever a post office is built the local regulations should be complied with. If he makes a general reference of that kind he will get his Bills through much more easily, because he will then not have Member after Member for towns specially mentioned getting up and making speeches, and other Members who are excluded protesting against these special references.

MR. WARNER: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will really carry out the half-promise he has made to bring it into some place where we can see and also arrange that we are able to see them in sufficient time. The great difficulty is that they are very often not deposited in time for people to realise that the injustice is being done to them. There have been two or three in my own constituency where the office has not given complete satisfaction in regard to site, etc., and where plans had been deposited in time for a satisfactory arrangement might have arrived at.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 :—

MR. CALDWELL pointed out in regard to this clause there was a difficulty connected with the plans. The policy of Parliament has been that when powers were given to any undertaker to pull down buildings beyond a certain number they should be rehoused. Owing to the plans, however, it could not be the effect of the proposals that the Office would be on the dwellings of the working classes.

MR. HANBURY said that the hon. Member had been to a certain extent by the proposal into the matter of the laying out. He did not think, however, that houses would be taken under the Bill, which, in the case of an ordinary Bill, would have come within the provision of the clause to which the hon. Member had referred.

MR. CALDWELL thought that the Secretary to the Treasury would give a general answer indeed. It really came to saying that the right hon. Member did not know anything about the Bill. The Committee were asked to pass the Bill without any of the information which they were entitled to. He would move some slight Amendment showing in the Bill, in order to necessitate the stage, and before that stage the necessary information could be given. It was evident, however, that intended to carry the Bill without amendment, but they could not expect to go through as easily as they would do. They were perfectly frank in the matter. Why should not a paying committee the Post Office pay in a business way, instead of seeking to escape ordinary liabilities that Parliament had upon everybody to whom committal powers were granted?

MR. HANBURY thought the hon. Member was wrong in not accepting his amendment with regard to the number of streets to be pulled down, but he would undertake to have the matter again looked at and the fullest information should be put on the Third Reading. If there were cases which in a private Bill would be within the operation of the clause introduced, he would undertake that that clause should be made to operate in regard to this Bill.

MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.) said that the effect of this clause taken Clause 1 would be that in some districts the assessable value of the district would be reduced. The Post Office might pull down buildings valued at £300, 400 and erect a building which the Government valuator might assess at only £100, with the result that there would be a decided loss to the local authority. This clause again proved how unfair it was that a local authority should not be allowed to assess these buildings on the same basis as other property in the district.

MR. HANBURY pointed out that the hon. Member seemed to assume that the property to be erected by the Government would be of less value than that to be demolished, whereas really the buildings to be erected would be much more valuable. It was quite possible to say the buildings would not be assessed at the same rate, because as a matter of fact the Government were exempt from rates altogether. The hon. Member should however recollect that, at any rate, within the last few years, the Treasury had seen to it that the valuation made by the Government valuer should be at least equal to that made by the local authority, and he challenged any hon. Member to point to a single case in which there had been any complaint in that respect from the local assessment committee.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL expressed his willingness to respond to the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman. In Stockton-on-Tees the post office, customs house, Inland Revenue house, county court, telephone wires, and other items were all rated at the small amount of £470. If they were assessed by the local valuer the amount would be much higher, and he believed the post office alone would be assessed at over £400. When the right hon. Gentleman asserted that Government property was assessed at the same value as other property was assessed at by the local authorities, if he would look through his own Return he would see that that was not the case.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 :—

MR. CALDWELL said that in this clause there was a general proviso that the Postmaster General might divert, alter, and stop up any street, roadway, or passage within the limits of any of the lands shown on the plans. In the case of this Bill they were dealing with two comparatively poor districts in London, and they were dealing with public rights. Sub-section 2 of Clause 6 provided—

“Nevertheless, nothing in this Act shall authorise the Postmaster General to stop up or close the public passage or footway between Lombard Street and King William Street, known as Post Office Court, in the City of London.”

He was not complaining of that, but it showed the different way in which London was treated as compared with other parts of the kingdom. He wanted to know exactly the effect of closing up that passage, because they had not the plans before them. Not having those plans they could not allow a passage to be closed without knowing exactly how and in what respect the public interests would be affected.

MR. HANBURY: The hon. Member must know very well that this passage could not be closed without the assent of the public authority, and that assent would not be given if it was against the public interest. The public authorities have had the fullest opportunity of seeing the plans and of knowing everything that was to be done. They had the power of presenting petitions against the Bill, but no such petitions have been presented, and no opposition whatever has been raised on the part of the local authorities. Therefore I think it is very strange that the hon. Member should repeat, on clause after clause, his want of confidence in the local authorities. The local authorities must know the circumstances of the locality better than anyone else, and they have had the fullest opportunity of seeing the plans. They have had the fullest information possible. The only real basis for any complaint which the hon. Member makes is apparently the sub-section which provides :—

Nothing in this Act shall authorise the Postmaster General to stop up or close the public passage or footway between Lombard Street and King William Street."

That is a very important passage, which the Post Office would never have thought of closing up, and therefore they have no objection whatever to this proviso.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 :—

*MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston) With regard to this clause I notice that both Clauses 7 and 8 are clauses very general in form. They have no particular application to this Bill, but they are special protective clauses which relate to the Corporation of the City of London, and to it only. Are these special protective clauses put into this Bill by reason of action by the Corporation of London during the pendency of this Bill, or is there any understanding between the Government and the Corporation that in the case of Post Office Bills these protective clauses shall be put in? It seems to me most important that this House should know what are the reasons why the Corporation of the City of London is treated differently to the other great corporations.

MR. HANBURY : So far as I know the only reason for putting in this clause with regard to the City of London is that it has been the practice for a great number of years to put it in. I am quite ready to admit that I do not think there ought to be any distinction drawn between the Corporation of London and other corporations. I will consult the solicitor to the Post Office on this subject, and I shall be perfectly willing to have amendments introduced in another place to other corporations affected by the exactly the same position as the Corporation of the City of London.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 :—

MR. CALDWELL said that a three years for the compulsory of lands was a rather long period wished to know why it was necessary.

MR. HANBURY : I cannot say three years is a long period. I have thought the argument would have been rather to extend the time.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 :—

MR. CALDWELL said it is very strange that they should ask for exemption only in the case of a particular district in London. The onus was upon the Secretary of the Treasury to justify this exemption in the case of Whitechapel, which is a very densely populated, and if they took more than they required an open space could be made in that overcrowded district. He did not see why, if they would put a post office up in a place of that kind, they should have any special provision.

MR. HANBURY : The hon. Member can hardly be aware of what is the practice in Railway Bills. In Railway Bills a clause to this effect is inserted, showing the difference between a Government Bill and a Railway Bill is that when a clause is inserted in a Railway Bill it is inserted in Railway Bills generally to all the parcels of property, but they carry a sweeping provision over the whole properties by them. The Government have done that in this Bill, but they have served this clause for one place only. With regard to other places we are perfectly willing to leave it within the four corners of the case has nothing to do with incorporation. The property we upon it a house with a large at the back. We do not the whole of this property, ler those circumstances that as been inserted in the Bill. e case has to be referred to a the jury decide that we have whole of it we shall have to DWELL said the reply which ren only showed the necessity the inquiry, because they had plans and consequently knew out this land. They knew ded Railway Bills that general put in, and if it had been put in a general way perhaps it ave needed any explanation. ie Government applied it only ary, Whitechapel, they were ave an explanation.

DWELL said that in this case nent had taken land for the and the clause contained a ich would prevent them dis-e land except by the permis-railway company. In case of it as to price it was to be arbitration. Why was it o bring in the Arbitration Act ettle the compensation to be hy could this matter not be e the Lands Clauses Act? He me little explanation was for there might be a special he mode of settlement was rent. He believed that under tion Act of 1889 the arbitra-ne by one arbitrator, whereas ands Clauses Act there would trators.

NBURY: The hon. Member lect that, after all, we are friendly concert with the d South Western Railway n this matter. The method e the Arbitration Act of 1889 le of arbitration which they l really there is very little between the two. This is the mode which the railway company prefer, and the Post Office is willing to agree to it. After all, I think the two parties concerned are the best judges of what the mode of arbitration ought to be.

MR. CALDWELL said his idea was to make the Bill symmetrical, although his proposal did not substantially alter the clause in any way.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 12, 13, 14, and 15 agreed to.

Bill reported, with Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

COUNTY COURTS (INVESTMENT OF DEPOSITS) BILL [Lords].

OIL IN TOBACCO BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CALDWELL thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to give some explanation of this measure

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The reason for the introduction of this Bill is to limit the quantity of oil used in the manufacture of tobacco, there being at present no prohibition as to the quantity of oil that may be used. It has been found that some manufacturers put too much oil into their tobacco, with the result that the public who consume it are injured and the revenue is defrauded. Not only this, but it is very unfair competition.

Question proposed.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

INEBRIATES AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL [Lords].

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [21st June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

POOR REMOVAL BILL.

[THIRD READING.]

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

LORD DAVEY: My Lords, I must apologise for troubling your Lordships with an Amendment to this Bill at this stage. My noble friend Lord Avebury, in Committee of the whole House, moved a clause which had the same object, but which was not substantially in the same words as the Amendment standing in my name on the Paper. That Amendment was, however, rejected. My noble friend was under the impression that he could move it again before the Standing Committee, but the noble Earl who presides over that Committee expressed the opinion that that could not be done. Therefore I ask your Lordships to consider the Amendment which I have put down. The first sub-section of Clause 1 of this Bill is as follows—

“A person who has resided continuously for five years in England shall not thereafter be removed to Ireland under the Acts relating to the relief of the poor.”

It has occurred to many of us that rather a large order and rather on its terms. An Irish labourer may be tramped about the country seeking finding, or not finding, work, for years or for a less period, and then may apply for poor-relief in a parish which, perhaps, he has only come to the previous week. It is unjust to ratepayers of that parish or union if they should be burdened with the maintenance of the Irish labourer, who has no connection whatever with the place, merely because he happened to be in a particular parish or union when he applied for relief. I propose, therefore, to insert, after the first sub-section, the following words—

“Provided that such person shall have resided continuously for at least six months in the parish or union from which it is proposed to remove him.”

That will give a guarantee of some confidential connection with the parish or union in which he seeks relief, and will also follow the precedent in the Sanitary Act. Under that Act the pauper can avoid removal from Scotland to be unless he has resided for, I believe, the whole year in the place from which sought to remove him. I am sure your Lordships will see that the clause stands, may impose a great burden on the ratepayers of a parish or union in which the pauper has no connection whatever, and I hope the House will agree to my Amendment.

Moved—

“In Clause 1, page 1, line 7, a poor’ to insert ‘provided that such person shall have resided continuously for at least six months in the parish or union from which it is proposed to remove him.’”—(Lord DAVEY)

LORD MORRIS: My Lords, I am sorry the House will not agree to this Amendment, which would practically render the clause entirely inoperative and useless. I cannot think my noble and learned friends can have studied the history of the question, which has been agitated for fifty years. It is thirty-four years since I myself moved in the House a similar Amendment—

“That the state of the law of removal from England to Ireland of persons receiving law relief is one deserving of the attention of Parliament and of the House.”

† See The Parliamentary Debates [Series], Vol. clxxxiv., p. 299.

Mr. Charles Villiers, who was at the head of the Poor-Law Amendment Bill, stated that this was "a very old grievance." That was his language four years ago, and this is the first attempt to remedy that grievance. I can appeal—in support of my statement—that this has always been a subject of great grievance in Ireland—to the Earl opposite, Earl Spencer, who has had a very long reign in Ireland as Lord Lieutenant. Under the present state of the law an Irish labourer who comes over as a boy, and who probably spends the whole of his life in this country, may, at an old age, when he is like a squeezed lemon, be sent over and pitched on the coast of Ireland to be taken care of by the first union into which he is placed. It is not a question between one parish and another parish; it is an international question between England and Ireland. There is at present no reciprocity. An Irish pauper who applied for relief in England can be removed to Ireland, but an English-born pauper who applies for relief in Ireland must be kept in Ireland by the union to which he applies. This question between different parishes in England has nothing to do with the Irish grievance. The English parishes must fight it out amongst themselves. If a man who has been absent from Ireland for five years does not form a settlement according to English law in a certain parish, what has that to do with Ireland? Why should he be sent back to Ireland on that account? The promoters of this Bill have drawn a very large limit in saying an Irish person should have resided for five years continuously in England before becoming irremovable. In my opinion that period is too long. I hope the House will not, at the twelfth hour, strangle a Bill which has been long looked forward to in Ireland, and which will remedy what has always created a great deal of annoyance and dissatisfaction.

*LORD AVEBURY: My Lords, the Amendment I moved when the Bill was in Committee was discussed for some little while and withdrawn. It was not rejected. The noble and learned Lord who has just spoken has not dealt with the case of this Amendment. It is not an Irish question. We have agreed that an Irishman who has been five years in England is to be relieved in England, but the question is where. The Bill gives him his choice, the amendment says he is to be relieved where he has worked. Why should an Irishman be placed in a different position in this matter from an Englishman or a Scotsman? If he were a Scotsman or an Englishman he would not obtain a settlement in the way indicated by this Bill. Under this Bill an Irishman, although he may not have lived in the parish or union in which he applies for relief more than a few days, is able to throw himself upon that parish or union for the rest of his life. Surely, if he has been working for some time in one part of England there should be power to remove him to that part of England when he becomes chargeable to the poor law. By this Bill as it stands you are cutting into the root of the whole law of settlement. All that my noble and learned friend asks is that the person shall have been for six months in the parish or union in which he claims relief. Surely that is a very reasonable suggestion. What we fail to see is why, in the case of an Irishman, all the safeguards in the working of the poor law which Parliament has devised in the case of Englishmen and Scotsmen should be dispensed with.

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I still maintain the view I expressed when Lord Avebury's Amendment was before the House. It is impossible to put the two countries on the same footing, for the very reason that in Ireland there is not a law of settlement and in England there is. An Englishman who happens to be in Ireland and applies for relief has to be relieved by the union in which he applies, and cannot be removed, whereas an Irishman applying for relief in England can be removed back to his own country. Therefore I say, if you are going to remove this difficulty, do it in a liberal spirit. It is only fair that, as an Englishman cannot be removed from Ireland, an Irishman should be placed in a similar position when in this country.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: This Bill does not give reciprocity. It says an Irishman must have resided five years in England before becoming irremovable. Reciprocity would be to put an Irishman in the same position in England as an Englishman occupies in Ireland. It would be reciprocity if an Irishman in England was entitled to obtain relief in any parish or union where he might apply for it and be irremovable. I certainly do feel as strongly as the noble and learned Lord opposite that this has been a real and substantial grievance in Ireland. The question is whether, in removing this grievance conditionally upon a residence of five years, it is desirable that you should place upon the parishes in which Irishmen apply for relief, and in which they may only have been residing for a few days, the burden of perpetually maintaining them.

LORD HARRIS: I was under the impression that the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition spoke on the Second Reading, and that he was a supporter of the measure.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I made exactly the same remarks on the Second Reading.

LORD HARRIS: I do not contest, as I said in Committee, the fact that England will suffer under this Bill. The measure was introduced with the idea of removing from Ireland some of the injustice she has long laboured under, and I do not deny that the burden has fallen upon England. I may remind your Lordships that this Amendment was negatived in Committee after a long discussion.

LORD AVEBURY: I beg my noble friend's pardon. It was withdrawn.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): Yes, after a full discussion.

LORD HARRIS: I understood that the noble Lord accepted the arguments as sufficient, and withdrew his Amendment. Technically I was wrong in saying it was negatived, but the noble Lord had an opportunity of going to a division, which he did not avail himself of. The proposal on that occasion was that the pauper should have resided continuously for at least twelve months in the parish or union from which it was proposed to remove him. The noble and learned Lord opposite now proposes a residence of six months. This would really do away altogether with the justice the Government asks you to do to Ireland. It would make removability very much more ~~easy~~ irremovability very much more ~~difficult~~. If you are going to do this act of justice to Ireland, I submit that it is ~~best~~ to do it with a good grace. The noble Lord below the gangway (Lord Avebury) argued that it would be hard upon the union of the parish on which the idea of maintaining the pauper would future rest unless such an Amendment were adopted. I admit that, but I do not think that unions and parishes in England are in risk, which is therefore shared by them all. I submit that as the Bill has gone through its various stages in the House, there is no reason for amending it in the way suggested by the noble and learned Lord.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: My Lords, asking your Lordships to give the Third Reading to this Bill, I shall not occupy much of the time of the House as is brought in to remedy what is grievance, and to do a piece of justice. In Ireland, as in England, there was a charge upon the land, and for a considerable time were paid by the occupier. Until the year 1823 tithes were paid in kind by the occupier, but at that time a change was made and although the occupier was left the person to pay, the change was that there should be a money composition. That went on for a considerable time—namely, until the year 1889. Then a further change was made, for public convenience, which was effected upon all sides, the landlord was the person who was to pay. A tithe-rent-charge was created, and he was the person to pay a sum that was fixed at three-quarters of the money composition. The assumption was, that he might add, to the amount of the tithe that he had to pay to the rent. That had been done in some cases, but I believe it was at all generally I have read statements by those who have studied the question indicating that it was not generally done. In Ireland, as in England, it has at all times been of the essence of tithe that it should be subject to occasional revision. The statutory machinery provided in Ireland for this purpose was different, namely, for England, from that in Ireland; the statutory machinery provided in Ireland was that if certain not proper methods were adopted, the tithe-rent-charges might be varied by reference to the average price of wheat and other commodities that were published from time to time in the Dublin Gazette. That was clumsy and inconvenient, and worked, as clumsy and inconvenient, but it did do work, in a kind of way for a long time. But in the year 1889 a change was made in the Dublin Gazette—namely, that it has ever been able exactly to show the change occurred—and the publication in the Gazette of the prices of the principal commodities, wheat and oats,

THE EARL OF MAYO: In what year did the noble and learned Lord say the publication of the averages in the Gazette ceased?

*LORD ASHBOURNE: In 1889.

THE EARL OF MAYO: I thought it was long before that.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: No. The publication of the averages ceased in 1889, for what reason no one has ever been able to find out, and, strange to say, the cessation of their publication was not ascertained or relied on in our Courts for a considerable time. The matter, however, came before the Courts in Ireland, and it was then contended, with irresistible force, that, as the averages had ceased to be published in the statutory way required, there was nothing that could be appealed to to satisfy the requirements of the Statute. Accordingly, what was an obvious injustice resulted. Up to a comparatively recent time the position of Irish lay and ecclesiastical tithes was exactly the same as to variation; they each had to be varied and revised by reference to the publication of prices in the Dublin Gazette. But at the time I am referring to this only applied to lay tithes. It is obvious that the absence of any machinery by which these tithes can be varied and revised is a clear and distinct grievance. This is, indeed, not denied or questioned by any one. The position of ecclesiastical tithes at the present time is somewhat different. They were dealt with in the Irish Church Act of 1869, when it was distinctly stated by Mr. Gladstone—I have his words here, and they have been quoted in the other House during the last three weeks—that the calculation of the then Government was that ecclesiastical tithes should be commuted at the purchase of 22½ years, with an interest not exceeding 3½ per cent. and an annuity not exceeding 45 years. When the Act came to be examined, however, it was found that the annuity, instead of running from the time stated, was to run for 52 years. How the figure 45, stated by the Prime Minister in his place in Parliament to be the proper figure, became 52 has not hitherto been explained; but it has never been suggested that it can be seriously defended or that it was anything but a most inconceivable blunder.

SPENCER: In what year?

ASHBOURNE: In the year 1889. I have mentioned no year that I have any particular conscience, and I do not think that anybody has ever been able to explain why the change was made.

Moreover, the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest pays off every farthing in 45 years, and it is only the simplest justice to get rid of the additional seven years which have in some way been added, and which cannot be defended or even explained on any theory of common sense or ordinary arithmetic. During the discussions—the anxious discussions—which took place in the House of Commons there was no effort on the part of the fitful Opposition interveners in Debate to give any vestige of explanation of this figure, and every one was compelled to admit that every farthing of the tithe was paid off in 45 years. The next step was taken in 1872. At that time, I believe, the Government had under consideration a loan on the security of the Church property—a loan of £9,000,000—and it was deemed desirable by Mr. Gladstone and the able Ministers who composed his Government that there should be a change in reference to tithe rent-charge, and that the power of revision should be taken away. It was considered a more satisfactory security not to have a variable charge, but that there should be a fixed tithe incapable of change. That was regarded as a better asset on which to rely as a security, and also more satisfactory to deal with. Under these circumstances the power of revision was taken away by the Act of 1872. It was a very short Act—a Treasury Act—and one which did not, so far as I can see, excite any attention whatever. It passed through Parliament towards the close of the session without debate, but it has been gravely alleged that the Act of 1872, by which the power of revision was taken away, was a bargain. The habits of my life and of my office require that I should use moderate and temperate language, but I am at a loss to describe in adequate terms this suggestion. It is a grotesque absurdity. Who was the bargain between? What was the bargain about? Why should there be a bargain? There is not a trace of any such suggestion to be found in Hansard, and I have spoken to gentlemen who were then members of the House of Commons, and they inform me that they never heard or dreamt of such a thing as this being a bargain. The suggestion is absolutely unsupported by proof, and has really no bearing upon the question. Had the power of revision remained, had it not been taken away by this Act of 1872, the tithe ecclesiastical tithe, like the English tithe, would, I have heard, be payable at a percentage much less than at present. Any rate, wheat has fallen from what it was by about 40 per cent., and oats by 22 per cent., and, as every one knows, there have been enormous reductions in the value of land. Therefore it is a simple justice to do what the Bill does. The statements cannot be contradicted. It is right in saying that there is a clear advantage to be righted and a palpable injury to be got rid of? The first of the periods is to reduce from 52 to 45 years the period provided for the redemption of the annuities, and, secondly, to remove the variation and power of revision in regard to both lay and ecclesiastical tithes. In England, where revision of tithes has been, as your Lordships know, a vast reduction in tithes, the tithe payers have been deprived of a benefit, and therefore it is simple justice to do what this Bill does. This measure has been described as a double-edged sword to Irish landlords, but it is the simplest, the nakedest, and the most just act of justice. If the payment of tithes had never been handed over to the landowner and were still payable by the occupier, could any human being suggest that every dictum of justice should not require that everything I have suggested should be carried out? It is not a one-sided proceeding at all. It was pointed out in 1885, when the first Land Purchase Acts were introduced, that it was not reasonable to ask tenant-purchasers to go on with their instalments with the rate of interest of the original rate of interest. Their friends in both Houses of Parliament said that justice required that there should be a revision. It was given it with universal approval, at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest on their loans cut down to £3 1s. 8d. No one then said that justice should not be done. Justice required that that should be done then in the interests of tenant-purchasers, and it requires that it should be done now in the interests of the lay tithe payers. In Ireland the system has been cumbrous, inconvenient, expensive, and difficult to carry out. Wheat has now grown in Ireland to the extent of 100,000 acres, and the standards formerly appealed to have ceased regulations for the purpose. The by which it is proposed to ascertain amount of variation—namely, by the judicial reduction of rents in each county, is fair, intelligible, and a thousand better than resorting to the old modes. Another important feature of the Bill is that it takes away the power of redeeming tithe rent charges, save in case of sales under the Land Acts, then it is intended to safeguard the same. There is another clause in the Bill dealing with the deduction of Poor Law from tithe, which the Chief Secretary calculated would assist the Irish Church Fund by a sum of about £6,000 a year. This benefit will be obtained in connection with decisions as to the deductions made from tithes for the Poor Law. The figures in reference to these matters have been very fully stated in the other House of Parliament, and I have confined myself to presenting the case to your Lordships in the shortest possible way, because I recognise that there are many other topics on your Lordship's Paper for discussion to-night. Of course, I will be quite ready to give any information to the House or to answer any questions that may be put to me at this or any subsequent stage.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Ashbourne.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I certainly feel a certain amount of embarrassment in controverting what has been said by the noble and learned Lord, because he has so pointedly laid it down that every proposition which he has put before the House is absolutely just, absolutely sound, and absolutely impossible of doubt. It may seem somewhat remarkable that I doubt the greater portion of the assertions the noble and learned Lord has made. First of all, I will deal with the very novel argument with which he commenced his speech, and which, I must say, surprised me extremely. It appears that at some stage of the Irish Church Bill, Mr. Gladstone, who was then at the head of the Government, and who, as the noble and learned Lord most justly said, took a special interest in that legislation, said that ecclesiastical tithes should be commuted at the purchase of 22½ years, with an interest not exceeding 3½ per cent., and an annuity not exceeding 45 years. Subsequently it appears that an interest of £4 9s. 0d. per cent. and a period of 52 years were fixed in the Act. On that the noble and learned Lord says there has been a great injustice, and that we should regard the statement made by the Prime Minister of that day in the course of a speech as conclusive. I have never heard such an argument. I always thought Acts of Parliament were conclusive. Mr. Gladstone is not alive to explain the words he used in 1869, but I entirely deny that we are bound by the statement of even so great a man as Mr. Gladstone.

LORD ASHBOURNE: Mr. Gladstone's words are not contradicted by arithmetic.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: But they are contradicted by something which is binding upon us quite as much as arithmetic—namely, an Act of Parliament. According to the noble and learned Lord, it is so perfectly clear that a great injustice was committed, because the Act is not in accordance with some words which he found in a speech of Mr. Gladstone, that we are bound now, after twenty-seven years, to remedy what was then done. If this is so extremely simple, so perfectly evident, so absolutely conclusive, what was the Conservative Government which came into office in 1874 doing? Had they no supporters amongst Irish landlords? The Act then was a very fresh one, and if the injustice had been so wonderfully apparent it would naturally have been for the Government of that day, which had no particular love for Mr. Gladstone's legislation, to remedy it. I dismiss that argument of the noble and learned Lord as having no bearing on the question. The noble and learned Lord said there was no bargain. The case really is that twenty-seven years ago Parliament laid down a certain principle for the payment of tithe, and it seems to me a dangerous doctrine, after Parliament has dealt with the matter so long ago, that we should now set aside that Act. Past legislation may have inflicted hardships on those subjected to it. That argument is one which may always be used. But I am surprised that twenty-seven years should have been allowed to elapse without any attempt to remedy any hardships in the present case. I deny that the Bill is a matter of justice; it is purely a matter of expediency. In the present state of prices an undue burden has been laid on the landlords of Ireland, and that should be lightened. That is the case of the Government, and I dismiss all other arguments. It comes to this, that after twenty-seven years the Government have made up their minds that they ought to make a present to the Irish landlords of a certain portion of the Irish Church fund. I feel some sympathy for the Irish landlords in the position in which they find themselves, but I must repeat what I have often said, that if the Irish landlords lived in the part of the kingdom in which I do they would not consider themselves so badly off. I object to the Bill on the ground that it is upsetting a deliberate arrangement made by Parliament, and then regarded as just and fair, for the purpose of giving a money advantage to a certain class.

LORD CLONBROCK: My Lords, it is gratifying to those who are interested in the Bill introduced by my noble and learned friend to hear him describe it as a mere measure of justice. It is, indeed, a tardy measure of justice, for relief in this matter has been promised to Irish tithe rent-charge payers for the last twelve years. In support of its being a measure of justice, I should like to compare the position of the English and Irish tithe rent-charge payer since the year 1872. It is somewhat singular, my Lords, that when a comparison can be made, by any stress of imagination, to the detriment of the interests of property in Ireland, such as, for instance, the comparison of the reduction of rents in England and Ireland, it is pressed home, however unsound may be the foundation upon which it rests; but when there is any comparison which would tell the other way, St. George's Channel appears to be an insuperable objection to its being adduced. Indeed, as to all rights of property, it seems to make all the difference in the world on which side of St. George's Channel the property is situated. I was much struck some days ago at hearing the noble Earl the leader of the Opposition condemning a Government measure—the Military Manœuvres Bill—on the ground that it assumed a certain control over a landlord's property for three weeks in the year, for ever. I thought at the time that there was a certain force in the noble Earl's objections, but I could not help contrasting this solicitude for the rights of property with the slight regard paid to those by the Land Act of 1881, an Act which deprived Irish landlords of more than per cent. of the fee-simple of the property, not for three weeks, but for the year round, for ever. I wonder the noble Marquess who had charge of the Bill did not notice the inconsistency. I suppose that the severe training which he underwent in 1896, before he was reduced, as he then told us, to the position of a tame elephant, has rendered him somewhat callous to the injuries inflicted on his wilder brethren. But a comparison between the English and the Irish tithe rent-charge payer shows that the former in 1872 had to pay £108 16s. 0d. for a £100 tithe rent-charge as fixed in 1872, while in 1899 he only paid £68 2s. 6d. Now by the Act of 1872 the tithe rent-charge in Ireland was rendered invariable, and the tithe rent-charge payer has ever since been paying the same amount as in 1872, notwithstanding the fall in prices. It is no wonder, therefore, that the opponents of this measure take very good care not to draw a comparison, and that they might be ready enough to do it if told the other way. My Lords, this settlement in 1872 is spoken of as a bargain, which tithe rent-charge payers gladly accepted, fearing that the price of corn might rise. Now, no one probably anticipated the deplorable agricultural depression which has since occurred, but, on the other hand, no one in his senses, seeing the continually increasing facilities for the importation of corn, could have dreaded as a tithe payer, or hoped for as a farmer, any decided rise in the price of corn. Indeed, prices, after some fluctuation, showed a tendency to fall in the years immediately preceding 1872. The fact is that the Act of 1872 was slipped through Parliament in August as a Departmental measure, without any explanation in either House, and escaped observation. But tithe rent-charge payers have suffered in another way by legislation. By the Church Act of 1869 the price of redemption of tithe rent-charge was fixed at 22½ years purchase. A high authority on the subject, Mr. O'Brien, has stated that in previous times it never was worth more than 17. On the other hand, in consequence of the Land Act of 1881, the selling value of property has been reduced from about 22½ years purchase of the old rent to about 17 of the new. Consequently the value of property been artificially reduced about 5½ per cent. on the purchase, and the charge on it specially raised by the same amount. I yet wonder is expressed that Irish landlords complain of being unjustly treated. It is needless to point out that the Church Fund has benefited by the extravagant price exacted from those who have redeemed, mainly under the 1869 Purchase Acts. The amount must be over half a million sterling. And, my Lords, as to the provisions of the Bill itself. While we can only consider it as a measure of justice, and as a partial measure of justice, we must acknowledge that the Government have exerted no effort to pass it in the face of a most determined and unscrupulous opposition. But the pity is that when they were prepared to take so much trouble, they did not make it a more comprehensive measure. For I must point out that, while it offers some relief to what I may call the more improvident persons, who did not commute their tithe rent-charge, it offers practically nothing to the more provident who did, for the reduction of the number of years from 52 to 45 is nothing more than the rectification of an arithmetical blunder. It cannot be contended that the Government intended to charge those who commuted £3 16s. 3d. per cent. interest, when the ordinary rate for Government loans was £3 10s. 0d. If the interest is taken at £3 10s. 0d., payment of £4 9s. 0d. per cent. for 52 years would mean the payment of £130 for every £100 advanced. We hoped that, in the case of those who had commuted, the Government would have ascertained the capital amount already redeemed, and treated the residue as a loan to be redeemed in the same way, and on the same terms as loans made to tenants. This would have involved no loss to the Treasury. Finally, my Lords, there is the case of lay tithe rent-charge payers, and holders of perpetuities. In their case there is no question of public money. But they have suffered from the failure of duty of some Government official. Their payments were not affected by the Act of 1872, but remained variable in accordance with the average prices of oats and wheat which ought to be published, and up to 1872 always were published, in the Dublin Gazette. The rents of perpetuity holders were also variable in accordance with those prices. But soon after 1872

these prices were at first incorrectly published, the mean being taken instead of the average, and since 1887 have not been published at all. Consequently no variation has been possible. The lay tithe rent-charge payers urge that they have an undoubted grievance against Government in this matter. They are by no means satisfied with the scale of variation proposed for them in the Bill, and cannot see why the prices published by the Land Commission should not be adopted in place of those which ought to have been published by the Government. The holders of perpetuities who have just the same grievance are not included in the Bill at all, as might easily have been done. My Lords, we are given to understand that if we attempt to introduce any amendments into this Bill, we shall probably lose it altogether. I do not, therefore, propose to do so. But I think it necessary to point out how much it falls short of what we might have expected, and to protest against the statements which have been made that it is a singular act of beneficence to Irish landlords. Moreover, it is not a measure affecting landlords alone. I may mention that in 1869 there were 36,000 tithe rent-charge payers, while the number of proprietors who could correctly be described as landlords was not more than a third of that total.

*THE EARL OF MAYO: It is a pleasure to see our old friend the Tithe Rent-charge Bill, of which we have heard so much, first of all in two Queen's Speeches and also in a great many debates, brought forward. It is a measure of justice, and I deny the statement of the noble Earl opposite that it is a boon. As usual, we are compared to English landowners. That is the comparison which is always made in this House, but what are the facts of the case? English landowners can have their tithes revised by the prices of corn and oats, but in Ireland there is no revision at all. As my noble friend Lord Cronbrock has gone so fully into the subject there is very little for me to say, except that we accept the Bill not as a boon but as a simple act of justice on the part of the Government. It is really time that the Bill was passed, and I am delighted to see it in this House. A short section was slipped into the Bill in the House of Commons which creates an obvious injustice. By that section it is provided that :—

“Sections three and four of this Act shall not apply to any tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission out of hereditaments the fee simple of which has, after the tenth day of August one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two and before the twelfth day of May one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, been conveyed to a purchaser on a sale.”

The argument adduced for the insertion of these words was that when the estate was purchased a certain allowance was made for the tithe rent-charge. But I must draw your Lordships' attention to the fact that the rents on the estate are reducible every 15 years, and it is hardly fair that the man who purchased the estate should go on paying the same tithe rent-charge. I only raise this by way of protest. I know it is no good moving an Amendment; but I hope the noble Marquess who is going to wind up the debate will say something on that point.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: Before my noble friend the Marquess of Londonderry makes his speech, which I am sure will throw a great deal of light on this question, I should like to say a few words. I agree with my noble friends who have spoken from this side of the House that this Bill is an act of tardy justice to the Irish landlords. One of the advantages of the Bill is that the question of revision of tithe rent-charge will be rendered perfectly simple. Under the old Act, to get a tithe revised necessitated the proving of the whole title to the estate. It was a matter of great difficulty. The co-operation of several people had to be obtained as a rule, and the cost was very often a great deal more than the thing was worth. I hail with satisfaction the simplification of the procedure. Having said that, I venture to express my opinion that we owe very little gratitude for this Bill. It is a sort of salve for the policy which has been pursued by the British Government in regard to Ireland for 28 years past, and which I cannot help thinking will inevitably lead to the absolute expropriation of the Irish landlords. I should like to ask, What has this country gained by this policy? Is Ireland more contented or more loyal? I venture to think, speaking for that part of Ireland with which I am best acquainted, and, I think I may almost say, for the whole Western seaboard of Ireland, that whatever may be the feeling of the Western Irishmen as regards Majesty the Queen, there never was a time when the Western peasant was disloyal to the English connection; the smaller landlords, the men who were being ruined by the land legislation, would not raise a hand to help the country in any difficulty she might

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: My lords, although my noble friend has last spoken have alluded to the fact that I was to wind up this debate, I confess that after the extremely explanatory, and, I think, complete speech of my noble and learned friend introducing this measure no words are necessary from me to recommend the Bill to the support of your Lordships. But I do not think it would be right that the speech of the noble Earl who followed him should be passed over in silence by the Front Ministerial Bench. As an Irish landlord, the Bill will affect me in the slightest degree; consequently I can speak of it in the most disinterested manner. My sense of justice force me to recognise that the Bill removes an unjust burden which the land-owning classes have borne many years laboured. The measure is not a “boon” or a “present” to the Irish landlords, as it has been declared by the noble Earl opposite. To me it is not even an act of general kindness. It is merely an act of justice; an honest endeavour to do very late in the day, a most unfair thing from the Irish landlords—a burden which would not be tolerated if imposed on any other class in any other part of the kingdom. My noble and learned friend who introduced the measure states that this small act of justice was of a tardy character. Never were truer words said. The Irish landowners have laboured many years in the hope that this act of justice would be brought about at some time or other. They remember the words of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who, as Lord Privy Seal, declared so long ago as 1888, speaking on behalf of the Government, that he recognised the difficulties under which the landlords laboured in regard to tithe rent-charge, and that it was their wish to afford a remedy for all the things which nobody could deny required immediate consideration. I am told that the recent addition to the Governmen say that the landlords of Ireland have a grievance in not having this act of justice done them, according to previous years ago. What strikes me as very extraordinary is that there has been so much opposition to this measure, which is itself so small. The amount of opposition to this Bill has filled me with amazement. After all, what is it that this measure does? It merely enacts that where a landowner has paid off the principal and interest the charge should cease to exist, secondly, that tithes should be payable as they were up to 1872, and they are in England at the present moment. It is obvious that they should be variable. If you go back to the Book of Acheson you will find that tithe was a proportion of the produce of the producer. That principle has been recognised from time immemorial, but since the Act of 1872 revision of tithe has been made impossible in Ireland. My noble and learned friend stated with justice that the price of wheat and oats had fallen very materially in Ireland since 1872. I have ventured to look up the statistics, and I can endorse his remarks on that subject. In the year 1872 the price of wheat, which in Ireland is calculated by the barrel of 20 stone, was £1 9s. 11d. per barrel, but in 1899 the price had fallen to 15s. 6d. per barrel. I can endorse also what my noble and learned friend told the House with regard to the fall in the price of oats. In 1872 a barrel of oats fetched 14s. 8½d. in Ireland, or, according to English calculation, £1 6s. 8d. per quarter; but in 1899 it was only worth 10s. 1½d. per barrel, or 18s. 4d. per quarter. Under these circumstances it is only fair to ask that the tithe rent-charge should be varied. The noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition stated, I think, that it was after close calculation in 1872 that the charge was fixed permanently, but in 1872 I do not think anybody imagined that there was going to be the Act of 1881, under which rents could be compulsorily reduced periodically until eventually the tithe rent payer might be left with no margin at all. I know cases in which rents have been reduced by 30, 40, 50, and even 60 per cent.—I will not say one word as to whether they were rightly or wrongly reduced—but surely it is not right, after such reductions have been made, that there should remain the same permanent tithe rent-charge upon the landowner. You should pursue the same system in Ireland as you do in England, which this measure is endeavouring to carry out, and not ask a landlord, because he is an Irishman, to pay on a different scale from that which obtains in England. In the House of Commons the Home Secretary of the late Liberal Government denounced the Bill as an iniquitous encroachment upon the Irish Church Fund which was intended for the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering in Ireland. The funds of the Irish Church have been used—and rightly used—for other measures than those to relieve unavoidable calamity and suffering. They have been used for arrears of rent, for sea-fishery loans, for the Intermediate Education Act, for the benefit of national school teachers, and for the Royal University. That attack comes with a very bad grace from a member of a Government who passed through the House of Commons a measure, fortunately rejected by your Lordships, for giving £250,000 out of the Church Fund to the evicted tenants—a body of men described by the Pope of Rome as having been guilty of an immoral action, and by the judges of the land as having taken part in an illegal conspiracy. Is it in the interest of the tenant-farmers that the Nationalist Members are opposing the Bill? I say “No,” and I ask myself again the question—Are the Nationalist Members of Parliament, who are all members of the United Irish League, real friends of the tenant-farmers, and is it in the interests of those farmers that they are endeavouring to oppose the Bill? I say that if they were true friends of the Irish farmers they would at the present moment be endeavouring to assist that class to take advantage of the Technical Education Act for Ireland, and to make the most of their opportunities, but instead of doing so they are trying to induce them to leave their land derelict. The real secret of the determined resistance offered to the Bill in the House of Commons was explained recently by Mr. Dillon, when he said that the great object of the League, and consequently of the Nationalist members, was to abolish landlordism and drive it out of the country. Now we know the real reason of the opposition to this measure. It is to drive landlordism out of Ireland, because it is the one barrier to total separation from this kingdom. When Mr. Dillon tells us that it is the object of the United Irish League to drive landlordism out of the country, I think it may be as well to consider whether it would be for the advantage of Ireland if this were to occur. I do not believe that the tenant-farmers generally desire that the landlords should be driven out of Ireland. Would it be beneficial to Ireland that the landlords should be expatriated? I reply deliberately that with the disappearance of the land-owning classes the ruin of Ireland would begin. The land-owning classes have been for generations past the backbone of the agricultural community in Ireland, and agriculture, as your Lordships know, is the great industry of the country. If you expatriate the landlords their places will be taken by the class below them, who, in their turn, may be forced out by the class below, and the result will be that Ireland will be owned and farmed by a race of men without capital and without resources, the majority of whom will be in the hands of the Gombeen-men. With that class of person in possession of Ireland there would be no confidence, and without confidence there would be no capital expended in Ireland. In the interests of Ireland it is the duty of your Lordships not only to relieve an injustice, but to retain in the country people who have its welfare at heart.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

LAND CHARGES BILL [H.L.].

Commons Amendments considered (according to Order), and agreed to.

THE RESERVE FORCES OF AUSTRALIA.

LORD BRASSEY: My Lords, I think I shall best introduce the subject which I desire to bring very briefly under your notice with a few figures. The armed forces of Australia include for service afloat 350 permanent men, 1,250 reservists, and 1,350 naval volunteers. For the land service the numbers are 1,250 regulars, 8,000 militia, 13,000 volunteers, and 12,000 cadets, trained as the cadets are trained in the public schools of this country. When we compare these figures with the citizen army of the Swiss Republic, it will be clear that hitherto preparations for defence, with the exception, perhaps, of harbour defence, have not been regarded as a matter of urgency in Australia. There was no foreign enemy near at hand, and full reliance was placed upon the Imperial army. Day by day we stand in a different position. Patriotic feeling in the colonies is keenly stirred. The war in South Africa has given occasion to our Australian fellow subjects to show how ready they are to share our responsibilities, and how great are the resources at their command. It seems a fitting opportunity to consider how best the mother country and the colonies may co-operate in the preparation of forces for the common defence. My Lords, I will deal first with the mounted infantry. The Australian colonies undoubtedly possess most exceptional resources for raising a force of that description. Every governor who serves in Australia is expected to travel with a mounted infantry over the country. Wherever he goes he is attended by a strong escort of mounted infantry, and it is impossible not to admire the endurance of men and horses under a fiery sun, and the skilful and bold horsemanship with which the men will ride, fours abreast, over the most formidable timber fences. It was a natural reflection that here were men specially fitted for such a service as our forces have been called upon to render in South Africa. Privately I made inquiries addressing myself to the Imperial colonial officers in all the colonies, and I was assured that at least 5,000 men could be raised upon the same footing as our yeomanry at home, and at a comparatively small expense. It was much to be regretted that on a late occasion when there was a most patriotic desire to send contingents to South Africa, those 5,000 men were not ready at hand. In Victoria we had several hundreds of mounted infantry upon the muster-rolls, but they were recruited from a class which could not be expected to volunteer in large numbers for foreign service. The majority were small farmers, to whom it would have spelt ruin to leave their farms at the commencement of the harvest. The true men of the bush were not numerously represented in the first contingent which we despatched. They came in later when special efforts were made and Imperial subscriptions had been contributed, and the resources were available for preparing a corps of bushmen. A force ready to serve whenever required must consist of the younger men. It should be raised rather from the wage-than from the wage-paying class. Training should be more complete, especially for the officers, than has hitherto been attempted in Australia. To a certain extent the force must be a paid force. Our mounted infantry in Victoria is not a paid force. I strongly urge Her Majesty's Government should take measures with the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia with a view to raising an Imperial Infantry in Australia of at least 5,000 men, under engagement to serve in any part of the Empire, the cost to be met by contributions from the Imperial Exchequer and from colonial funds. If the principle be accepted, a scheme could be worked out on the spot by the commanders and the ministers of defence. It would take time to gather information, time to prepare a plan, time to confer with the Colonial Government on the political considerations involved. The work I venture to say should be taken in hand without delay, in preparation for practical action as soon as the Federal Government of Australia has been set on foot. My Lords, I pass from the enrolment of a force of mounted infantry to the general efficiency of the colonial military forces. In deference to political considerations, the Imperial forces have been wholly withdrawn from the colonies. Their removal has left the colonies without infantry or cavalry up to the standard of smartness which can only be obtained by constant drill. In the altered circumstances in which we stand to-day the question of raising and maintaining a small Imperial force of infantry and cavalry in Australia would seem worthy of consideration. It will not be necessary that the forces should be kept at the full strength in the time of peace. A single squadron of cavalry and a few companies of infantry at the military headquarters in the several States would be of the greatest value for the instruction of large bodies of militia and volunteers assembled for reviews and for camps of exercise. They are needed to stiffen the Militia and Volunteers, which have not the advantage of constant drill. There is only one further suggestion which I should like to offer bearing upon efficiency. It is borrowed from a recent work by an eminent military writer, Sir George Clarke. I refer to the advantage of occasional, perhaps annual, inspections of the colonial forces by an Imperial officer of high standing. If it were possible that his Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught should pay a visit of inspection to Australia it would give great encouragement to loyal feeling, and I feel sure would be an immense advantage to the army. I may mention that under a recent regulation the naval forces of Victoria are annually inspected by the Commander-in-Chief on the Station, and that inspection has proved of the greatest advantage. My Lords, I pass from the military to the naval forces. Australia will not compare with the sister colony of Canada in the numbers of its seafaring population, but there are in Australia ample resources for the creation of a colonial naval reserve. Official inquiries have lately been made and it has been ascertained that we have, in the coasting trade and fisheries of Australia, more than 30,000 men. The men earn high wages, and those wages are well earned. The seamen in the coasting trade and fisheries of Australia are men of superior qualifications both in seamanship and in general intelligence and conduct. Having for many years taken the deepest interest in the question of a Colonial Naval Reserve, it was to me an immense satisfaction when I came home two years ago on leave, to hear from Mr. Goschen that the Admiralty had at last decided to take steps to raise a Colonial Naval Reserve. The announcement was followed by an official communication from the Commander-in-Chief on the Australian station. The terms offered by the Admiralty were identical with those established for the Naval Reserve at home, and without modifications they were not acceptable to the seafaring class in Australia. I may refer more particularly to the regulation requiring six months service on a man-of-war upon a low scale of wages. I earnestly hope that the Admiralty will not allow this matter to drop, and I would urge that instructions should be given to the Commander-in-Chief, directing him, in consultation with the local officers, to revise the regulations which are established for our Naval Reserve at home, so as to make them suitable to Colonial conditions. In this connection, I would like to say a few words with reference to the report made by the naval advisers of the Australian colonies with reference to this question of a Colonial Naval Reserve. That report has been criticised as a proposal to establish a merely local force. I believe that report to have been misunderstood. The true feeling in the colonies must be gauged by recent events. When we stood in a recent crisis face to face with the sudden emergency in China, no objection was urged to the removal of certain vessels from the Australian squadron to China. The colonies offered a ship, which has been accepted; they offered the services of their naval brigades, which have also been accepted. What has happened lately I feel sure would happen again. I feel certain that all the available naval forces of the Australian colonies will at all times be available for Imperial defence. My Lords, I have only one other observation to make. The proposal that payment should be made from Imperial funds for the maintenance of forces in Australia may be challenged in certain quarters, but the principle of paying men from Imperial funds in Australia was accepted when the Admiralty consented to the enrolment of a Naval Reserve. If a retainer is paid to the seamen, why not to the mounted infantry? In conclusion, it seems to me clear that recent events have made it evident that steps must be taken to strengthen our military and our naval resources. If the work is to be done without imposing intolerable burdens, it must be by means of reserve forces, and I hope I have shown to the satisfaction of your Lordships that proposals for raising reserves in Australia should be included in the comprehensive scheme for which we look to the Government in the next session of Parliament.

*VISCOUNT FRANKFORT, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention had been drawn to a letter in The Times of July 12th "on Colonial Reserves," and whether he approved of the suggestion therein made by Major General French, commanding the New South Wales military forces; and whether he proposed to consult the Secretary of State for the Colonies in regard to the advisability of taking steps to obtain the insertion in the Federal Defence Act for all Australia, shortly to be brought forward, the necessary powers for the formation of such war reserve, said: My Lords, I have listened with great attention to the noble Lord who has just sat down. The question I have put on the Paper is rather with regard to war reserve than with regard to forces to be raised in the colony, but I think we all agree that the defence of the Empire is a most important subject. A few days ago the Australian Commonwealth received the Royal Assent, and there is no doubt that the people of Australia are willing to take their share in the defence of the Empire. I am anxious that no time should be lost in taking steps to obtain the insertion in the Federal Defence Act for all Australia of the necessary powers for the formation of a war reserve. The writer of the letter which appeared in The Times of the 12th of August is by no means an amateur. He has served some 12 years in Canada and a like number of years in Australia. He was more or less responsible on the military side for the Military Land Act of 1884; at the present moment he is commanding the New South Wales military forces. He has come to the conclusion that a scheme is feasible which would be mutually advantageous to the land and the Colonies and of benefit to the Empire in which they live, and in his own words "for which we ought to do our utmost." With regard to the suggestion Major General French makes is this. He suggests that the 75,000 fishermen and sailors on the Atlantic seaboard might make a very large and a very useful war reserve for our fleets. With regard to Australia the rate of wages current in Australia is high that it is impossible to have a very large force for peace duties. But on the other hand any number of men will go forward in time of war at a fair rate of pay. Now what is proposed is to form a reserve of, say, 10,000 men with a retainer fee of £8 per man per annum for efficient privates of infantry, £12 per man per annum for troopers of mounted corps who have horses and saddlery and are fit for service, and other ranks in proportion. The approximate cost of such a force at, say, £10 per head would be £100,000. The requirements of such a reserve would involve an annual course of training in rifle and musketry. This reserve should be formed mainly from the efficient officers and men who have passed through the ranks of the defence forces, and who agree to serve within or without Australia in war time. The 6,000 men that are now out in South Africa would make a capital start for this reserve. As I have said, the notion is that the cost of pay is to be paid by the Imperial Gov-

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE):
My Lords, with the general principle laid by the two noble lords, who have expressed your Lordships I desire to

The war which is now going on in South Africa will be ever memorable in which for the first time the

of this country and those of our colonies have fought side by side, do not think we can overrate the impression which has been produced, not only upon the people of the United Kingdom, but upon the people of the British Empire, but upon all parts of the world, by the exhibition of colonial spirit and loyalty, which we have witnessed. Throughout these difficult and arduous operations, during critical stages when success seemed to be far from us with slow and halting steps, nevertheless, when our progress has been rapid and satisfactory, the colonial forces have borne a distinguished and valuable share in the hardships and in the dangers of the war. My Lords, as I have mentioned this, I am impelled to refer to the telegram which we all of us have read from Lord Roberts two days ago in which he mentions how in a recent hard-fought action beyond Pretoria, two young Canadian officers, when leading their men in a counter attack on the enemy's flank at a critical juncture of an important engagement lost their lives, one of them being the only son of the Canadian Minister of Militia and Defence, a young officer whom Lord Roberts describes as having twice before been brought to his notice in despatches for gallant and intrepid conduct. When we think who was the writer of that telegram, and with what feelings he must have written it, I think we may say that no more touching tribute could have been paid to the memory of these brave young representatives of our Colonial forces. With regard to the Australian contingents, I do not think the noble lord who spoke first at all overrated the value of the services which they have rendered. I think there are between 8,000 and 9,000 of them at this moment fighting for us in South Africa, and they have exhibited those qualities, not only of personal courage, but of great endurance, fine horsemanship, and resource and readiness which his experience of the Australian Colonies led him to attribute to them. I think the noble lord is perfectly right when he describes Australia as pre-eminently a country of mounted infantry. You have there men of the right stamp, and you have abundance of horses of the right stamp. There may be a certain difficulty in obtaining horses of the type that we require for cavalry and artillery, but the mounted infantry horses can be obtained in almost infinite numbers. I am sure we all of us feel that this co-operation of the colonial forces has not been the result of any passing mood on their part; it is not a mere momentary effervescence of loyalty, it is the result of a deep-seated patriotism and an abiding desire to bear with us a part in the burden of Empire.

I am sure one and all of us would wish and hope that if this country should find itself again circumstanced as it has been of late we should find the colonies ready to take their place by our side. And if it would be possible, as the noble lord behind me desired, for us to come to some understanding with the colonies by which

that co-operation might be rendered easier both for them and for us, I for one should greatly rejoice at it. But I venture to suggest that the matter is one in which we can scarcely proceed with too much caution. I cannot help thinking that increased assistance in numbers and increased efficiency, might be too dearly bought if they were paid for by any loss of that wonderful spontaneity which has characterised the co-operation of the colonies on this occasion. I could not help being struck by the concluding sentence of the letter of General French, which the noble and gallant Lord quoted, in which he says:—"Now is the time to act. If we wait till the cold fit comes on progress may be made impossible." I cannot help saying that this sentence suggested to my mind an inference rather different from that which the writer probably intended to suggest. I should be sorry if we were at this moment to take advantage of the manner in which the colonies have come forward during the last nine or ten months in order to hurry them into any arrangement which upon mature reflection afterwards some might think irksome or inconvenient. I confess I am a little reminded of the analogy of the Volunteer Bill, which I lately passed through your Lordships' House and which was severely criticised by noble Lords opposite, who said we were endeavouring to persuade the Volunteers in a moment of popular excitement to assume permanently a liability which the force as a whole might afterwards object to. That provision met with an unfortunate fate in another place. But I think there is an object lesson to be drawn from that Bill, and I would say that if it is necessary to proceed with caution when we are dealing with our own forces in this country, still more must we be cautious when we are dealing with the forces of the colonies. I entirely agree with what the noble lord on the back bench said, that in a case like this the scheme must be worked out on the spot. There is no doubt about that. I also agree with him that it should be worked out under the supervision of that Federal Government which is about to come into existence under such auspicious circumstances. All I can say is that we are perfectly ready to discuss a scheme, but in our opinion it is desirable that the initiative should come from the colonies, and that we will certainly give them all the assistance, and all the co-operation that they can possibly get from us. The discussion of the details of such a scheme would at the present moment, I cannot help thinking, be a little premature. The two sides seem to be agreed upon that we would like to see raised in the colony a special body of troops, receiving training, paid partly by us and partly out of colonial funds, and liable in circumstances for active service to the limits of the colony to which they belong. The noble Lord opposite I think, of a force of 5,000. He did not mention the financial arrangements which I should recommend. The noble Lord opposite regarded with favour the proposal of General French, who proposed that we should have a force of 10,000 in Australia, receiving, in time of war, a retaining fee of from £8 to £10 paid by us, and who would be available for active service in case of Imperial emergency. I must ask the noble Lord opposite to receive with a certain amount of reserve General French's estimate of the cost of these proposals, because according to his calculation 10,000 British cavalry would cost the country £1,000,000 a year, and Australian mounted infantry £100,000 a year. To begin with, we do not accept a calculation which puts a charge of £100 per head on British cavalry soldier; and, of course, it is impossible to make a comparison between the cost of troops who are only available for a short time at rare intervals and on special occasions and the cost of troops whose service is continuous and whom you must make use of whether the emergency is great or little. There are a great number of points which it is necessary to consider with care before any scheme of this kind can really be adopted. I cannot say one or two of them. I think it is to be presumed that if the British troops are called upon to pay for their own reserves he will require to be satisfied as to the efficiency of the troops for whom he pays. Then there is the question of the tests which would have to be applied to the troops which would lay down those tests and from time to time inspect es would they have for train-vals?—these are all points I require to be examined. The most important question is the content of the liability which would be expected to assume. Is the noble Lord behind me General French's letter and at these troops should be called upon within or without war time. Who is to decide war is one of such importance to call upon the colonies? Is it in this country we cannot have Reserves, we cannot embody we cannot call up the Volunteers? Is it a proclamation of emergency in the case of the colonies, who is to make the proclamation of the emergency?

Would it be the Parliament or the Parliament in the colonies? It is very regrettable if it should be that while in the opinion of the noble Lord it appeared that there was no emergency in the opinion of the noble Lord that the emergency is sufficient. Those are all points which have to be looked in the face of the noble Lord said, worked out before we could arrive at an answer. There is another point.

Is it the place of these colonies in the military system of their own? The noble Lord knows that for many years past it has been policy to concentrate our Imperial troops at home, in India, and in a few great garrisons. We have withdrawn our troops from the outlying colonies. Our policy has been to in the colonies, so far as possible, to leave them for their own defence. The Empire really gain unless we have additional reserves, which the noble Lord said, were additional to the forces required for the colonies themselves? If the colonies serve only a part of the time, I do not think it would be satisfactory if, at a time of emergency, we found ourselves calling away from the colonies the very élite of their forces. It would be what is called "pulling the eyes" out of their little eyes, again, is a point that will be considered. Then the noble Lord made another suggestion. He said, "Should we not raise in the colonies corps of cavalry or infantry to form part of the British Army, but which would be raised and maintained in the colonies?" The noble Lord knows the colonies a great deal better than I do, but I confess that I should have thought that an almost insuperable obstacle in the way of the adoption of such a proposal is the very high rate of wages which obtains in the colonies. General French tells us in his letter that the minimum rate of wages paid by Government contractors is 7s. a day. I am afraid that that is a rate which, when compared with the wages the British Army receives, becomes almost prohibitive. When the noble Lord, not long ago, was in communication with the War Office upon this subject calculations were made, and I believe the result was to show that a force of 5,000 men paid at the rate of 6s. a day would cost no less than £400,000 more than a similar force paid at Imperial rates; and at the rate of 7s. a day it would cost nearly half a million a year more. That is rather a formidable obstacle, I think, to the proposal that we should raise a part of the Imperial Army within the colonies.

LORD BRASSEY: I said only a small force for the purposes of instruction.

*The MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: No doubt the smaller the force the less the expense would be. One reason the noble Lord adduces in favour of his proposal—and I think it a very sound reason indeed—is that since we have withdrawn British troops from the colonies there has necessarily no longer been in the colonies that high standard of smartness and efficiency provided by the well-trained and permanently trained forces forming part of the Imperial Army. I confess I think it is extremely desirable that that standard should, if possible, be afforded, and an attempt has been made to arrive at that by a system of inter-changing units between the colonial and the Imperial forces. I mean that a colonial corps should for a time take its place in a British garrison and a British force should take its place for a time in a colonial station. That is a matter that was discussed by the present Secretary of State for the Colonies at a conference with the Colonial Premiers in the year 1897. The idea was, on the whole, favourably received, and the War Office entirely approved of it. New South Wales, I believe, accepted the proposal, and was prepared to exchange a company of its garrison artillery with a company of Imperial Garrison Artillery. I believe New Zealand made an offer, and in Canada there have been similar interchanges between the troops belonging to the garrison of Halifax and the troops belonging to the Canadian Militia. The matter was progressing far from unfavourably when unfortunately the war came, and put an end to the negotiations which were going on. With regard to Naval Reserve, I can say little of my own knowledge, but I am authorised to say that, in principle, the First Lord of the Admiralty entirely accepts the idea of a colonial Naval Reserve, but he thinks, as, no doubt, does the noble Lord opposite, that it would be more prudent to wait for the accomplishment of Federation before attempting to advance the matter any further. My Lords, I can only add to what I have said that, agreeably to the suggestion of the noble Lord behind me, I shall make it my business, in consultation with the Secretary for the Colonies, to advance the policy the noble Lord has advocated as much as we can possibly advance it. I can assure you no one hopes more anxiously and keenly than I do that in years to come we may find the soldiers of the great colonies fighting side by side with our own Imperial troops in the same patriotic and loyal spirit which they have exhibited during the war now in progress.

EARL CARRINGTON: I hope your Lordships will bear with me for one single moment while I express the pleasure with which we on this side of the House have heard the eloquent words of the Secretary of State for War, when he spoke of the patriotism of the Colonies, in answer to Lord Brassey, whom we are glad to see present after five years service rendered with so much pride to himself and so much advantage to the great colony of Victoria. With regard to what Lord Brassey has said as to colonial mounted infantry, perhaps I may be permitted to say that fifteen years ago when I was in Australia I was much struck with the possibilities of mounted infantry in those colonies, and it was with peculiar pleasure that I read that the New South Wales Lancers were the first of the colonial contingents to arrive at the Cape, the first to be sent to the front, and the first to come under fire.

The Marquess of Lansdowne.

Lord Brassey spoke of the deep patriotism that exists in the colonies, hardly think that the colonists then know how deep-seated that patriotism is. It seems to me to be like one of the great Australian underground rivers, disappear in the bowels of the earth, then come up again, and appear, disappear again, and then when they are tapped they rise in a huge geyser, rushing down in a mighty torrent into the ocean. I think we can always have the colonies on our side, but it must be on one condition. This we must recognise that there must be perfect equality between the soldiers of our great self-governing colonies and English, Scotch, Welsh, and Irish. The noble Marquess said that we must move with great caution. Now great caution is necessary, but I venture very respectfully to suggest to him that we ought to insist that there shall be perfect equality between Imperial and colonial forces, and that all honours and rewards shall be shared equally to both sides. I think of Her Majesty's servants in the colonies, to the strength of the men turned as mentioned the other day appears that a certain number of lian contingent were sailing in Liverpool. Some of these were asked to contribute their opinion on the matters referred to in the report, and I think the statements are significant. Of course I am not from the reports given to me, but what was said in effect is that on some respects there were some things which were remembered with regard to the medical arrangements; at the same time they offered a great deal of admiration with regard to the arrangements. I venture to think that is significant, because in such vast numbers those of this war it is not in certain sections of arrangements might be defects or misfortune side by side with those there are elements and matters calling for admiration. My Lords, I am sure, will be common in Lordships, at the touching sympathy which fell from the press, with regard especially to the South Africa of the two lieutenants, one being Lieutenant only son of the Minister of Canada. The noble Marquess, as Secretary of State for a past Governor-General of one whose name is familiar to me in that country; and, successors in the position of General of Canada, I venture to suppose that the words which the noble Marquess will be well-known throughout the Dominion with recognition. With regard to matter of the question I would say that at Netley there must be some invalided home from South Africa; evidence might be taken from his experience at the seat of war; that there will be no delay in getting to work.

DUKE OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, every reason to believe that the Commission will commence its work without any delay. The noble Marquess that the appointment to the Commission was only a day or the day before. But the Commission intend to start immediately, and I know also that we are sure to lose no time in taking up the important question committed to them.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—ASSISTANCE TO REFUGEES.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any steps have been taken to assist the escape of foreigners who have fled from the interior to places on the rivers or sea coast of China.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): All foreigners have been brought from Wenchow to Shanghai, and a vessel has been hired to bring away refugees from Chung King if necessary. At other Yang-tze ports there are gunboats, and there are also men-of-war at Woosung held in readiness to proceed to any port where they may be required. Consul-General Warren was empowered on 12th July to take any steps in concert with the senior naval officer which may be considered necessary for bringing away refugees.

PEKING LEGATION NAVAL GUARD.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Admiralty know the names of the officer, non-commissioned officers, and men who formed the guard at our Legation at Peking, and if so, whether he will notify them to the press, and if the Admiralty have not ascertained the names will he take steps to do so.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): The names of the officers attached to the guard of Royal Marines at Peking are:—Captain Lewis S. T. Halliday, H.M.S. "Orlando"; Captain Bernard M. Strouts and Captain Edmund Wray, H.M.S. "Centurion," for service at Wei-hai-wei. The relatives have been informed, but the names were not sent to the press. The names of the non-commissioned officers and men are not known. If any certain news is received of the fate of the Peking Legations the Commander-in-Chief may be depended upon to inform the Admiralty by telegraph, but while it is uncertain he naturally does not do so.

*SIR J. COLOMB: Will the Admiralty take steps to ascertain the names?

MR. MACARTNEY: It is not necessary. The Commander-in-Chief will take the earliest possible steps to communicate the names.

*SIR J. COLOMB: I suppose the hon. Gentleman knows that there is great anxiety?

MR. MACARTNEY: Yes, Sir; and the Admiralty will take immediate steps to relieve that anxiety. As soon as the Commander-in-Chief has trustworthy news he will, of course, communicate it.

INDIAN TROOPS FOR CHINA—COST.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the expenses of the 22,000 troops withdrawn from the Indian establishment to serve in China will fall on the Imperial or on the Indian Exchequer; and whether provision will be made, having regard that no fewer than 90,000,000 persons in India are affected by the famine now devastating that dependency of the Crown, that the maintenance of the regiments, native or otherwise, now serving out of India be not charged directly or indirectly on the Indian revenue.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I have on several occasions stated that all the cost, both ordinary and extraordinary, of any Indian troops sent to China would be paid by the the Imperial Exchequer. The number so sent is not 22,000, but less than half that number.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Do I understand that the actual ordinary expenses of the regiment will be paid not by the Indian, but by the Imperial Exchequer? We have had this point raised before, and I want an explicit answer.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have answered.

JAPANESE TROOPS FOR CHINA.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state what is the number of Japanese troops now landed or about to land in China.

*MR. BRODRICK: According to our latest information about 14,000 men had either landed or were on route on 17th July. It is expected that 2,000 more will embark by Sunday next.

YANG-TSZE VALLEY—ENGLISH SUP- PORT TO THE VICEROYS.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to enter into arrangements with the Viceroys of the Empire with the view of preserving peace and order in their respective jurisdictions, and whether they had given, or are prepared to give, definite and pledged to support the Viceroy.

*MR. BRODRICK: Her Majesty's Government have, as I have already informed the House, empowered General Warren to inform the Viceroy that in any efforts they may make to store order they may count on the support of Her Majesty's ships. I have further pledges of support have been asked for or seem necessary.

MR. YERBURGH: In consequence of that answer, I give notice that I repeat the question on Monday.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—TREATMENT OF BOERS IN BRITISH HOSPITALS.

*MR. H. D. GREENE (Shrewsbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any considerable number of Boers have received medical or surgical assistance in our hospitals, and whether he can state approximately how many, whether any complaints have been received from the Boer Government, Boer officers, or Boer patients in regard of the medical or surgical services rendered by us, or of the means and appliances provided by us, and whether there is any ground for believing that they have been dissatisfied; whether the medical and hospital assistance requisite for care of the opposing forces tended by in addition to our own was foreseen and arranged for; and whether he can state the number of our soldiers who received medical or surgical aid in hospitals.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Before the question is answered, may I inquire in the third paragraph of the question is not of order, seeing that it embodies the expression of the opinion that the assistance was requisite?

*MR. SPEAKER: I wish the Member was never more irregular.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM): About 450 Boers have been admitted into British hospitals, mostly wounds. No complaints have been received. The probability that we have occasionally to give medical assistance to Boers was foreseen and they received the same treatment and attention as our men. There are Returns showing how many of our men were admitted to Boer hospitals.

REPORT — CATERING ARRANGEMENTS ON THE "CUSTODIAN."

PAULTON (Durham, Bishop and): I beg to ask the Secretary of the Admiralty whether, on the arrival of the transport "Custodian" at South Africa, complaints were made to the officers on duty concerning the food served and the mess and canteen arrangements on board during the voyage to Cape Town; and, if so, what report has been made on the subject.

MR. MACARTNEY: The report of the officer commanding the troops on the voyage in question, which I am glad to show the hon. Gentleman, is that there was no cause of complaint in respect of the provisions issued, and that everything appertaining to the comfort of officers and men on board was well carried out. I am also informed that while one man complained to the commanding officer of everything on board, his comrades did not support him and stated that his allegations did not merit inquiry.

THE "AVONDALE CASTLE" CANTEEN PRICES.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Queen's regulations for the Transport Service fixing the prices of canteen articles to be supplied to troops on board transport vessels were applicable to the R.M.S. "Avondale Castle," on her voyage from Southampton to Cape Town, between 12th May and 10th June, and, if they were applicable, why these regulations were not adhered to, seeing that the troops on board that vessel were charged a price for aerated waters double that prescribed by the regulations; and will he state what action will be taken by the War Office in the matter, having regard to the observations made by the officer in command in his report on the voyage, and to the possibility that similar non-observances of the regulations may recur.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The owners of the "Avondale Castle" have explained that the overcharge for aerated waters was made by mistake. The amount involved is small, but if the Volunteer battalion applies for its refund the owners will be asked for the money.

UNDER-AGE RECRUIT—PRIVATE WALSH, 1ST MUNSTER FUSILIERS.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can state if Private P. Walsh, 1st Regiment Munster Fusiliers, who is reported in despatches from Cape Town on Thursday last as having been wounded, is the same Private Walsh who was stated recently to have enlisted when under sixteen years of age; whether he has yet attained that age; and whether, in the event of his having been wounded, he will be sent home by the first available ship, and discharged from the Army with an adequate pension to assist in the support of his mother.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Private Walsh is the soldier referred to by the hon. Member in his question of the 4th inst. The question of invaliding depends on the severity of the wound. Should his wound lead to his discharge, the amount of his pension will be decided in accordance with regulations by the Chelsea Hospital Commissioners.

MR. FLAVIN: Then this is the boy. Will he be sent home by the first available ship?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have answered that question.

SOUTH DENES CAMP, YARMOUTH—COLLECTIONS BY THE SISTERS OF NAZARETH.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the regulations issued by Colonel Brownrigg, inspecting the Volunteers on the South Denes, Yarmouth, forbidding the Sisters of Nazareth to collect pennies from the 4,000 Volunteers now in camp; whether Colonel Brownrigg has any authority for issuing such regulations; and, if he is aware that the sisterhood who were sent back are of the same order as that which was so highly commended for nursing the sick and wounded in South Africa.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no information at the War Office on these incidents. The exclusion or admission of strangers in camp is a matter within the competence of Colonel Brownrigg, as officer commanding the brigade.

DR. TANNER: Is it the fact that these ladies were excluded in consequence of their religion?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have no knowledge of the matter, but if the hon. Gentleman alleges that an unfair distinction has been drawn, and that privileges have been denied to these ladies which were granted to others, I will inquire into it.

DR. TANNER: I will repeat the question on Monday.

BOOTS AND CLOTHING FOR THE TROOPS.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he has any information to the effect that Lord Roberts' army is now hampered by the want of boots, and that a large portion of the troops now under his command are almost barefooted.

*MR. WYNDHAM: In consequence of statements on this subject in the press, the Secretary of State had a telegram of inquiry sent to Lord Roberts on the 14th instant, and the following reply has been received—

"Pretoria, 18th July, 12.55 p.m.—The temporary break in communications and necessity for giving preference to troops and supplies occasioned delay in issue of boots and clothing to some units. The last consignment arrived to-day."

COLENZO ENGAGEMENT—COLONEL LONG'S REPORT.

GENERAL RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of the Government to publish Colonel Long's report regarding the abandonment of eleven guns at the battle of Colenso.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I must refer my hon. and gallant friend to the answers which have been given by the First Lord on the general question of the publication of despatches and reports.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to revive the hon. Gentleman's question of that last March—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will you let me put it this way. I will, if I may, once sit down if you rule me out of order. Sir Redvers Buller made a successful attack on Colonel Long—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is putting an obviously irrelevant question.

3RD INNISKILLING FUSILIERS.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state how many men of the 3rd Inniskilling Fusiliers, stationed at Cowshott Manor Camp, responded to the call made in February last to volunteer for service in South Africa; was any deprivation of privilege made in the case of men who then declined to volunteer; and how many men responded to the further call for Volunteers made in this corps in the present month, and how many of the corps have been visited with pleasure for refusal.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The 3rd Inniskilling Fusiliers were not asked to volunteer for service abroad either in February or later.

INVALIDED SOLDIERS—STATE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War how many officers, non-commissioned officers, and men have been invalided home since the outbreak of the war; of these how many have been invalided home, or in military hospitals, or in their own homes; and how many have been incapacitated from further service by wounds or disease.

*MR. WYNDHAM: 20,658 have been invalided home; of these 63 died on the passage and 60 in military hospitals; there is no record of any having died in their own homes. 430 have been incapacitated from further service by wounds or disease.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to give roughly the proportion of

JIL TRIBUNAL AT JOHANNESBURG.

SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to the Secretary of State for the ~~ies~~ whether, in addition to the ~~ary~~ tribunal at Johannesburg, a ~~style~~ the Court of the Chief ~~strate~~ has been appointed over which ~~officer~~ styled the Chief Magistrate ~~es~~; whether this Court has cogni- of and jurisdiction in all criminal except murder, treason, sedition, robbery, arson, and concealment of ; whether the Chief Magistrate is ~~wered~~ to inflict sentences not ex- ~~ing~~ two years imprisonment, fines ~~exceeding~~ £100, and to sentence to ~~punishment~~ of flogging, the flogging to exceed 100 lashes; and whether ~~Colonial~~ Secretary can give any ex- ~~ation~~ of the establishment of this ~~ibunal~~, and on what evidence Sir Alfred ~~alner~~, as High Commissioner, has sanc- ~~ioned~~ the establishment of a tribunal to ~~which~~ the power of sentencing to the lash entrusted.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I have no informa- ~~tion~~. All the arrangements for pre- ~~serving~~ law and order in the Transvaal ~~are~~ entirely in the hands of Lord ~~Roberts~~.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: As this is a ~~matter~~ of flogging, will the right hon. ~~Gentleman~~ ask his agent, Sir Alfred ~~Milner~~?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir.

MARTIAL LAW—PAPERS ON THE CAPE REBELS.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secre- ~~tary~~ of State for the Colonies whether ~~any~~ Papers in reference to South Africa, ~~especially~~ in reference to the communica- ~~tions~~ between the Home Government and the Cape Government in regard to the Cape rebels, will be presented before the Colonial Vote is taken.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I hope the ~~Papers~~ will be in the hands of Members ~~before~~ the Colonial Vote is taken.

ARMY CHAPLAIN AT HONG KONG.

Mr. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether there is a commissioned chaplain to the forces at Hong Kong; if not, whether, in view of the importance of Hong Kong as a military base, imme- ~~diate~~ steps will be taken to appoint one.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Commissioned chaplains are, as a rule, sent only to the larger foreign stations. There is an acting chaplain at Hong Kong who devotes his whole time to the troops. He is at present, however, on leave, and his duties are being discharged by the local clergy. The question of an increase in the establishment of chaplains is under consideration. The House is aware that the Hong Kong garrison has recently been reduced.

LORD HUGH CECIL (Greenwich): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the supply of chaplains has been found to be insuffi- ~~cient~~ in the present South African cam- ~~paign~~?

Mr. WYNDHAM: There was a time, perhaps, when it was not sufficient, but I believe every demand has now been supplied.

SENTRY DUTY IN THE METROPOLIS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state what number of men are detailed for guards and sentry-go in the metropolis in each twenty-four hours when the battalions and regiments are on home service, and what is the necessity, if any, of posting sentries over empty buildings and public offices when pro- ~~tection~~ could be afforded by the police; and whether the sentry on the War Office was incapacitated by the heat on Tuesday.

Mr. WYNDHAM: There are five officers and 218 non-commissioned officers and men detailed for guards and sentry- ~~go~~ in the metropolis. There are no sentries over empty buildings. The matter has been very thoroughly con- ~~sidered~~ and the numbers in recent years have been largely reduced. The sentry on the War Office was unfortunately overcome by the heat on Monday.

MAJOR RASCH: Is the right hon. ~~Gentleman~~ aware that a man in a tunic buttoned close up to his throat, and wearing a heavy bushy, and carrying a rifle on a beat extending only ten yards, cannot be a very mobile protector?

[No answer was given.]

OUTLAY UPON BELLEVILLE BOILERS.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state approximately the amount spent upon Belleville boilers for the Navy during the last five years.

MR. MACARTNEY: It is not possible to state the amount spent upon Belleville boilers, as they are included in the tender for the propelling machinery and are not priced separately.

MR. HEDDERWICK: Has the hon. Gentleman no approximate idea of the cost?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Is it not over £5,000,000?

MR. MACARTNEY: I can give no other answer. It would involve an examination of all the contracts.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Cannot you say the cost within a million?

[No answer was given.]

BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY—REPORTED TRANSFER TO THE CROWN.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government have been negotiating with the British South Africa Company for the transfer of its territory to the Crown.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir. I have heard the rumour, but there is not an atom of foundation for the suggestion contained in the question.

BRITISH TRADE IN MADAGASCAR.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any, and, if so, what reply has been received to the representations made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the French Government in July, 1898, that their action in greatly increasing the import duties upon the principal of British manufacture was a fraction of British rights in Madagascar inconsistent with the international of this country, and with the given by the Government of the

*MR. BRODRICK: No direct has been received to the representation made in 1898, the French Government having stated that they adhered to the reply upon the subject which was given by Monsieur Hanotaux on the 23rd of 1897. This reply has already been before Parliament.

CABLE COMMUNICATION BETWEEN THE WEST INDIAN ISLANDS.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that, although the Island of Jamaica is now in direct graphic communication with the Empire through British cables by Island, Bermuda, and Halifax Scotia, no steps have yet been taken to establish a direct communication between Jamaica and the other West Indian Islands, and that the cables to Jamaica with the fortified coaling of St. Lucia and the Islands of St. Vincent, and Trinidad, and West Indian Islands, as we mainland of British Guiana, foreign soil at one or more whether he is aware that British Honduras is also dependent upon cables, and that if a colonist Honduras wishes to telegraph to the United States or England he must make a journey into the neighbouring of Guatemala or Spanish Honduras in order to do so; whether the Office have these matters under consideration; and whether he can any hope of being able to deal with these grievances.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The points raised are as stated. The points raised by the hon. Member's question have been fully considered, and will not be of. Considerable expenditure is involved, and I cannot promise immediate action in the matter.

INDIAN FAMINE—LOANS TO STATES.

SIR WILLIAM WEDD (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he to specify the amounts advanced Government of India to the native States by way of famine whether, when making each loan, Government of India ascertained that it was exercising economy in its administration, with a view both to relief of the famine-stricken and to payment of the loan; and whether Bhaunagar State in Kattywar applied for a famine loan of 30 lakhs, what is the reason why Bhaunagar, recently prosperous, is now in financial straits, and whether the Government of India satisfied that this State has reduced all unnecessary expenditure both in India and in England.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The total amount of loans to native States for purposes sanctioned up to the end of 1899, either from Government funds or on Government guarantee, was £1,217,000. Most of these loans will be found at the end of the Papers presented to Parliament regarding Famine Relief in Native States, which Papers will, I hope, be distributed before the end of next week. The Government of India has repeatedly indicated strict economy on native States suffering from famine and applying for financial assistance. Applications for loans to such States and their conduct of relief measures are subjected to such scrutiny and supervision as are possible without undesirable interference. Bhaunagar is undoubtedly a prosperous State, but its Government has recently invested £507,000 in its railways, and had a working cash balance of only £20,000 at the beginning of the year. Owing to the famine, its income has shrunk and its expenditure has increased considerably. The net deficit to be met was estimated in March last at £147,000, and so the State applied for and received a large loan from the Government. The ways and means of the State, its intended expenditure, and the possible economies to be made were considered by the Government of India before the loan was granted.

REMISSIONS OF LAND REVENUE.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that in the famine of 1896-7 the Government of the North-West Provinces remitted land revenue to the extent of Rs.6,000,000, while the Government of Bombay remitted Rs.13,000; and whether, looking to the remarks of the Famine Commissioners of 1898, who approved the liberal remissions in the North-West Provinces as mitigating distress, while taking exception to the course followed in Bombay, he will urge upon the Bombay Government a more liberal policy than that followed by them in 1896-7.

LORD G. HAMILTON: In the North-West Provinces, where the population of the affected districts may be taken to have been 19½ millions, the Government during the famine of 1897-8 remitted revenue to the extent of six million rupees; in Bombay, on a population of eight millions, about 800,000 rupees were either remitted or suspended, and 5,300,000 rupees were loaned out to occupiers. The Commissioners point out in their Report that the land revenue assessment of the Bombay Deccan is admittedly light; and, on the whole, I am not prepared to accept without reservation the hon. Member's version of their opinion as to the measures taken in the North-West Provinces and in Bombay respectively. So far as the famine is concerned I have every reason to believe that the Bombay Government are acting in a judicious and liberal spirit towards the cultivators under their jurisdiction. In Guzerat alone the Bombay Government report that they had up to July deliberately left uncollected two-thirds of the land revenue in the affected districts.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: The noble Lord will understand I am referring to remissions and not suspensions?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Quite so.

RAINFALL IN THE FAMINE AREAS.

SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has official information to the effect of the telegraphic news received since yesterday of satisfactory rainfalls having taken place in the areas affected by the famine; if so, can he give the total of the rainfall since the monsoon set in up to date in several affected districts, and state if it is regarded as decidedly improving the prospects of the ensuing crops in those parts.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I am glad to say that I have received a report of good rainfalls in most parts of the famine area. The telegram giving this intelligence was dated Simla, the 14th July, and has been published in the newspapers. But I am afraid I cannot at present give precise figures of the rainfall up to date in the several affected districts.

CATTLE IN THE FAMINE DISTRICTS— SUPPLIES OF SEED GRAIN, FODDER, ETC.

MR. C. P. SCOTT (Lancashire, Leigh): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state what, approximately, are the percentages of deaths among the cattle in the famine districts, and what funds are available for the supply of cattle, fodder, and seed grain to the cultivators in these districts; and what steps are being taken to secure a supply of fodder for the surviving cattle, and what proportion of the cattle recently supplied to make good previous losses have died from want of fodder.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have no precise figures about the mortality among cattle. We shall learn some months hence what approximately the losses have been in British districts when the yearly returns are made up of the number of cattle alive. No similar returns are made for native States. The funds at present allotted for the supply of seed grain and cattle to cultivators in British districts are 123 lakhs for advances to cultivators. The charitable funds have also distributed for the same purpose a considerable sum to the poorer cultivators. Strenuous efforts were made in parts of the Bombay Presidency to collect and distribute fodder earlier in the season. Now that rain has come and grass is growing I do not anticipate that further endeavours in that direction will be required. I am not able to say what proportion of the recently supplied cattle have perished from lack of fodder or from lack of water.

CHOLERA IN THE FAMINE DISTRICTS.

MR. C. P. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the outbreak of cholera in the famine districts of India, any, and, if so, what, addition has been made to the famine medical service; and whether he can state the number of deaths from cholera in the famine districts.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I am glad to state the number of additional officers and medical subordinates in the famine districts in consequence of outbreak of cholera. I was in India that, as regards the worst cholera in the middle of June, the local authorities there had received as much medical help as they thought necessary. The returns which have reached me show that during the month of June 11 cholera deaths were reported from the famine districts, and there were 10 from native States similarly affected. During the three weeks ending on the 1st July, the reported cholera deaths were 6,562 a week for British famine districts and 6,185 a week for native States similarly affected by famine.

INDIAN PENAL LAWS.

*SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, looking to the loyalty and patience manifested by the Indian while suffering from grievous calamities and looking to the benefit to the interests from such manifestation at present time, he will consider it by withdrawing recent penal legislation this loyalty may be recognised, Indian people assured of the confidence and appreciation of Her Majesty's Government.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The courage, and resignation manifested by the Indian people in the most grievous calamities are fully appreciated by Her Majesty's Government and by the people of this country, and on more than one occasion both the Viceroy in India and the Secretary of State in England, have expressed their unstinted expression to our admiration of their demeanour and conduct. I know what the hon. Member means by withdrawal of recent penal legislation certainly during my tenure of office such legislation has been sanctioned.

*SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: Does not the noble Lord understand that I refer to the law with regard to sedition, which now appears necessary?

LORD G. HAMILTON: If the hon. Member will be good enough to state that law I think he will find it me as that which obtains in this

TAXATION IN INDIA SINCE 1886.

WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I ask the Secretary of State for whether he will grant a Return ing the amount yielded by new tax imposed in India in or since ar 1886, and stating in each case purpose for which such taxation was time said to be imposed.

LORD G. HAMILTON: There is no tion to the motion for the Return the hon. Baronet desires.

COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF IN INDIA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): beg to ask the Secretary of State for dia how long has the office of Comander-in-Chief in India been vacant, and when is an appointment to be made.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Sir W. Lock-art died suddenly on the 18th of March, and since then General Sir Power Palmer has discharged, as acting Commander-in-Chief, the functions of the office. A permanent appointment will be made before long.

SILVER COINAGE.

MR. W. F. D. SMITH (Westminster):
I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the coinage of fiveshilling and four-shilling pieces is to be continued, and whether he can state if any representations have been made by retail traders as to the inconvenience of these coins.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The coinage of double florins has been discontinued since 1891.
Those remaining in circulation are in course of withdrawal. No representation as to the inconvenience of crowns is recorded as having been received at the Mint or the Treasury. Only a very small proportion of the silver pieces issued is in crowns. In 1899, out of an issue of 32,129,100 of such pieces, only 159,100 were crowns. It is not proposed to discontinue their issue.

INCOME TAX—INTEREST ON MUNI-CIPAL LOANS.

SIR ALFRED HICKMAN (Wolver-hampton, W.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the reasons why income derived from payments for interest made by municipal authorities is charged with the full duty of 1s. in the pound for the whole period in respect of which the same is payable, whereas income derived from similar payments made by public companies or private persons is calculated at the increased rate only since the date when the increased duty was imposed.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The distinction, which leads to a difference of treatment in respect of income tax, between income derived from payments for interest made by municipal authorities, and income derived from similar payments made by public companies or private persons, lies in the fact that in the latter case the interest is paid out of profits and gains assessable to income tax, while in the former it is (as a rule) paid, or partly paid, out of rates, which are not so assessable. In this latter event Sub-section 3 of Section 24 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, applies, and this distinctly prescribes that the rate of income tax shall be that in force at the time of payment. I may be allowed to add I think that some public inconvenience is caused by the existing difference of treatment in this matter, and I propose to examine the possibility of adopting a uniform system.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Will regard be had to the case where there is obviously a charge in excess, like the Jamaica railway debentures?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No. I do not think that was a case of excessive charge.

PRISON TREATMENT OF DEBTORS.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state how many persons are at present detained as debtors in Her Majesty's gaols, whether under the prison rules such persons are obliged to wear prison uniform, and whether their treatment as to food, exercise, and such matters differs in any particular from those convicted of criminal offences.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): There were 474 male and eleven female debtors in custody on the 17th instant. Debtors are permitted to wear their own clothing unless it is unfit for use, in which case they wear the same uniform as prisoners awaiting trial whose clothes are unfit for use. They have the same food as offenders of the first division, and are allowed to exercise twice a day. Generally speaking, their treatment differs in almost every particular from that of convicted prisoners.

METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state whether the Metropolitan Police Force is at present below its establishment, also whether desirable recruits are now forthcoming in sufficient numbers and continue to remain in the force.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The force is at present below its establishment chiefly owing to the Reservists being called out for service with the colours. A sufficient number of properly qualified recruits is forthcoming to rather more than meet the normal needs of the force, but not sufficient to replace the absent Reservists or to make good augmentations. The answer to the last few words of the question is in the affirmative.

UNDELIVERED POSTCARDS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, seeing that undelivered postcards are returned to the senders only on the condition that a request for their return must be placed on the outside before posting, and on the payment of a return postage of one halfpenny on delivery, while undelivered letters are returned to the senders without any extra charge or request for their return, whether he can say why postcards are differently dealt with, and which side of a postcard the Post Office authorities describe as the inside.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): These postcards are treated differently from letters, because the half-penny post is not in itself returnable, and in the great majority of cases return to the sender of undelivered matter passing at the halfpenny rate is not desired and involves much extra labour. Such packets can be returned to the sender so desired, by placing on the address side a request to that effect. The official regulations make no reference to the "inside" of a postcard.

CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE OVERTIME.

MR. WOODS (Essex, Waltham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, in view of the amount of overtime performed by the staff of the Central Telegraph Office, London, the Postmaster General is considering the advisability of increasing the number of operators; whether it is intended that such increase should be effected by the addition of unestablished telegraphists at lower wages than the ordinary operators receive; and, whether the Postmaster General will take steps to provide new telegraphists shall be placed in position with reference to pay and rights similar to that of the established staff of the London office.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is considering the advisability of adding to the staff in the Central Telegraph Office in order to reduce overtime, but it is not intended that unestablished telegraphists should be employed for that purpose. Officers appointed to the established class of telegraphists will receive the pay and privileges proper to that class.

COOTEHILL (CAVAN) POST OFFICE MASTERSHIP.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he has examined correspondence which passed in 1898 relative to the appointment of a previous postmistress of Cootehill, Cavan; and, whether, seeing the condition requiring her to give up her business was attached to the appointment, he can state why a similar condition was not attached to the appointment of the present postmaster; and whether he has liberty to say on the authority of the official his recent statement was

R.I.C. MEDICAL APPOINTMENT FOR TIPPERARY.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the death of Dr. Nadin, Tipperary, who was doctor to the Royal Irish Constabulary at various stations, the men in each barrack were asked to choose a successor, and their choice was ratified in every case except Tipperary and Limerick Junction, where the police, thirty-four in number, almost unanimously selected Dr.
O'Dwyer, but that in this case the County Inspector intervened and recommended a practitioner who had only received one or two votes, and that Dr. O'Dwyer was then set aside by the Inspector General and the position given to the nominee of the County Inspector, although his qualifications were in no respect superior; and will he explain why the wishes of the force were not allowed to prevail in this case as in that of all the other vacancies created by the death of Dr. Nadin.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRE-
LAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I am informed it is not the fact that the police at any of the stations in question were asked to choose a successor to Dr. Nadin. The gentleman selected for appointment at Tipperary and Limerick has been longer in practice than Dr. O'Dwyer, and had also attended the police on previous occasions when the late medical attendant was unable to do so, and had given every satisfaction.
While of course every attention is given, as far as possible, to the wishes of the constabulary in a matter of this kind, the choice of a medical attendant is not with the men, and the rule is to appoint the most experienced and most suitable doctor.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do I understand that in the other cases no steps were taken to consult the wishes of the police?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I do not know how far their wishes were consulted. Whatever was done was done in an informal manner.

MR. T. M. HEALY: However informal, is it not the fact that in all cases, except that of Tipperary, the wishes of the constabulary were met?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: That I cannot say.

GRAZING IN PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will state the annual profit received by the Government from letting the Phoenix Park for grazing cattle, and whether any of the London parks are similarly let; is he aware that the bullocks in the Phoenix Park are not herded, but continually stray on the roads and paths, to the annoyance of the public; that filth from the cattle disfigures the walks; that they are allowed to trample down and dirt that portion of the sward of the park most used for games by the citizens; and that in the London parks sheep are introduced whenever it is necessary to eat down the grass; and whether any steps will be taken, by efficient herding, to prevent the Phoenix Park roads and walks from being obstructed and defiled by cattle.

MR. HANBURY: The average annual receipts from grazing rents in the Phoenix Park during the past five years were £626 3s. 4d. There is no grazing in St. James's Park, but £64 a year is received for grazings in Hyde Park and the Green Park. No complaint has been received from the public with regard to the bullocks. The size of the park renders it impossible to prevent completely the straying of cattle on the roads, but every effort is made to keep the cattle off the roads (especially the main road) and preserve the cleanliness of the walks. No serious inconvenience with regard to games has arisen, and no complaint has been made. Sheep are introduced into some of the London parks to eat down the grass. A similar plan was tried in Dublin some years ago, but the grass did not suit sheep.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are herds employed to keep the cattle off the path?

MR. HANBURY: Yes, Sir.

IRISH BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS—
ASSISTANT SURVEYOR OF BUILDINGS.

SIR GEORGE FARDELL (Paddington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will explain why Mr. R. W. Carden, the successful candidate at the recent examination for the situation of assistant surveyor of buildings in the Architectural Department of the Board of Public Works, Ireland, after having received notice of his success, has been rejected, although his qualifications fulfil the requirements set out in the regulations issued by the Civil Service Commission on 27th April 1904, concerning such examination; and whether it is proposed to appoint Mr. Donohue, because he happens to be at the time in the temporary service of the Department.

MR. HANBURY: Mr. Carden was rejected because his qualifications did not fulfil the requirements to which the Member refers. They were prima facie satisfactory; but they did not bear investigation. No appointment was made on the result of the examination.

TRACTION ENGINES ON ROADS.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—1. Have any representations been made to him about the state of the law in Ireland in relation to the use of traction engines on public roads? Is he aware that owing to the use of traction engines on the coast road between Glenties and Lerne the road authorities have the cost of maintenance so much increased as to be a source of embarrassment, while no power exists by which they can oblige the owners of the engines to contribute to the cost of repairs to the road. 3. Is he aware that the County Antrim Grand Jury passed a resolution calling upon the Government to amend the law in Ireland to that of England regard to the passage of traction engines along public roads, complaining at the same time that the owners of engines carry on their traffic under illegal conditions. 4. And will he insert a clause into his Bill to amend the Government (Ireland) Act, placing the law in Ireland upon the same footing as the law in England.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Representations have been made to me of the character mentioned in the first paragraph. The average expenditure on the coast road between Glenties and Lerne has been increased about 30 per cent within recent years; I am unable to say whether this increased expenditure resulted in any embarrassment as to the traffic, but, if so, the case would appear to be one in which an application for an amendment of the limit under Section 2 of section 2, of the Local Government would probably be entertained by the Local Government Board. The to the third paragraph is in the alternative. The Amendment suggested last paragraph would not be by the title of the Bill now before House. Under Section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, as amended by Section 12 of the Locomotives Act, 1898, damages can be recovered by local authority in England in respect of excessive wear on highways by reason of extraordinary traffic. These enactments do not, however, apply to Ireland, and will consider the question of assimilating the law in this respect in the two countries with a view to possible legislation in a future session.

BOTANICAL GARDENS, DUBLIN.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can state what has been the annual expenditure for the past ten years on Kew Gardens, London, and the Botanical Gardens, Dublin.

MR. HANBURY: The total gross expenditure from 1890-1 to 1899-1900 was on Kew Gardens, £261,408 5s. 10d.; on the Botanical Gardens, Glasnevin, £18,769 6s. 1d.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to consult the Secretary for the Colonies as to the desirability of making an extra grant for the Botanical Gardens, Dublin?

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Give us some orchids.

SUTTON TO HOWTH TRAMWAY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the effort to represent the passing of the Bill to extend the time for the completion of the Great Northern Tramway from Sutton to Howth as an exoneration of the manner in which the work has up to the present been done; and whether, before sanctioning an inspection of the line by his inspectors, he will obtain an undertaking from the company that fresh Parliamentary powers will be applied for, or else enforce compliance with the original Act prescribing that the tramway shall be laid along the road and with its rails on a level therewith.

MR. HANBURY: The company state that if Parliamentary powers are necessary to authorise the deviation which has been made at the request of the grand jury, they will take an early opportunity of applying for them. In the meantime, the Board of Trade do not think it would be in the public interest to decline to allow an inspection for the purpose of ascertaining whether the line can be safely worked.

LISTOWEL TO TARBERT RAILWAY.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will receive a deputation with a view of giving a grant of money or providing a means for giving such grant, for the construction of a railway from Listowel via Newtown Sandes and Ballylongford to Tarbert; and whether, in view of the fact that a portion of the district is congested, and of the want of travelling facilities as well as of employment to the poor, he will favourably consider the request made.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There are no funds available for the construction of a railway from Listowel to Tarbert, and therefore no useful purpose would be served by my receiving a deputation, as suggested in the question.

MR. FLAVIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman receive a deputation?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is exactly the question the right hon. Gentleman has answered.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a large number of meetings can be held in North Kerry calling on the Government to make a grant?

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman not find a slice of the Church Fund for this purpose?

POLICE PROTECTION NEAR LISTOWEL.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of police employed in protecting the farm in Derry situate near Listowel, the property of John Sands, and whether the police so employed cost the district £160 per year; and, if not, how much; and whether, having regard to the present condition of the district, the extra police so employed on this farm will be removed.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Two constables are employed in protecting the caretaker on the farm referred to. They will be removed when, in the opinion of the authorities locally responsible, the necessity no longer exists for their employment. The men are supplied from the free force of the county, consequently their employment entails no charge whatever either to the district or the county.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the whole duty these men have to perform is to arrest the emergency man and charge him with drunkenness?

CELTIC MANUSCRIPTS—SALARY OF IRISH SCRIBE.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that an annual sum of £200 has been voted from 1865 to 1891 to the Royal Irish Academy as salary to an Irish scribe, including cataloguing and printing Irish manuscripts, and that a like sum has been included in the general grant-in-aid voted to the said Academy between 1892 and 1899; whether the transcription of Celtic manuscripts ceased on the death, in 1880, of Mr. O'Longan, the last of the Irish scribes, whether the copying of Irish manuscripts since 1880 has been by photograph, and whether the photographing of old Irish manuscripts ceased with the completion of the Yellow Book of Leccan in 1895; and, if so, can he say what has been done with the £200 a year voted for Irish scribes since 1880, and the £200 a year for printing Celtic manuscripts since 1893; whether the proceeds of the sale of the four folio volumes facsimiled or photographed at the expense of Parliament have been refunded to Her Majesty's Treasury, or spent on the general purposes of the Royal Irish Academy; and whether, if the Royal Irish Academy be unwilling to publish Celtic manuscripts, he will consider the desirability of transferring the present annual grants for this purpose to some of the other existing antiquarian societies in Ireland.

MR. HANBURY: The sum of £200 was voted from 1865 to 1870 for the Irish Scribe and for Cataloguing and Printing Irish Manuscripts, and from 1870 to 1890 for "Researches into Celtic Manuscripts." In 1891 the estimate for 1890-1 and up to 1894, a special item was merged in a grant of £400 for "Researches into and Publication of Celtic Manuscripts." Since the grant to the Academy has been made as a lump sum, but the Academy has from year to year allocated a certain amount to such researches. Since the death of Mr. O'Longan in 1880 the manuscripts have been reproduced by lithography, and the last one published was the Yellow Book of Lecan in 1895. The proceeds of the facsimiles published by the Academy have never been sent to the Treasury. The receipts from five volumes of "Facsimiles of the Manuscripts of Ireland," published by the Stationery Office, were, of course, paid into the Exchequer. The Academy is anxious to continue publication of Celtic MSS. But it has full discretion as to the disposal of its grant-in-aid, and recently it has devoted its income mainly to collecting material for a Thesaurus of the Irish language, which will be a most important study of the texts themselves.

MR. DILLON: What are the researches to which this sum has been devoted during the last few years?

MR. HANBURY: To the preparation of a dictionary of the Irish language.

MR. DILLON: Will that dictionary be published before the end of the century?

[No answer was given.]

MONAGHAN ASYLUM WORKS.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Government whether the Lieutenant of Ireland has stated that the governors of the County of Monaghan demanded from the Council of Monaghan £6,500 for sewerage and other works, the county council, not knowing the expenditure at the asylum, stated that will leave the council in debt of a hundred pounds at the end of the year, and they have to pay this claim of errors; and whether he will in this work is necessary, and pro- at the governors of the asylum future give notice to the County of Monaghan before making such tlay.

augmented by five men to enable better protection by patrols to be given to a caretaker in the locality. Mr. Warden receives protection because such protection is considered necessary. These additional constables cannot be withdrawn until their services are no longer required.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that 50 per cent. of the tenants on this estate are excluded from the benefits of the Land Act by the recent action of this landlord?

MR. FLAVIN: And is he aware that the magistrates in petty sessions have signed a petition for the withdrawal of these men?

IRISH EDUCATION—NEW REGULATIONS.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen a copy of a memorandum issued by the National Teachers Association of Ireland, in reference to certain provisions contained in the proposed new rules and regulations issued by the Commissioners of National Education, and the probable injury to the cause of primary education; and whether, in view of the fact that the extract from said rules was only issued a few days ago, the Government will delay their adoption of them for a period of about six months, in order to give the managers of schools and the school teachers an opportunity of considering their effect on the system of primary education in Ireland.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have not yet seen the memorandum referred to, but I had the opportunity yesterday of an interview with a deputation of Irish national teachers on the subject of the new rules. The answer to the second paragraph is in the negative; the Government have no such power, nor do I think it would be desirable to exercise it if they had.

MR. FLYNN: How long must the rules be on the Table of the House before they receive the sanction of Parliament?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: They do not require the sanction of Parliament. They are already in force.

G. W. BALFOUR: This question is to be founded upon a misapprehension of the facts. The governors of the asylum have not demanded a sum of £100 from the county council for the referred to. The joint committee of the asylum, which includes a certain number of members of the Monaghan County Council, applied to the Local Government Board for sanction to two loans, one of £6,500 for sewerage and works, and another of £2,500 for building a new church. Advertisements issued by the joint committee in papers circulating in the district inviting any ratepayer or owner of property desirous of making a representation to the Local Government Board in connection with the proposed loans, to do so within fourteen days. No objection was received by the Board, and they have accordingly sanctioned the loans—to be repaid in thirty and forty years respectively. The proportion of the amount of the two loans of £9,000 for which the county Monaghan is liable is £3,872, the county Cavan being liable for the remainder. A printed copy of the notice of the proposal to apply for these loans was sent to every representative of the county council acting on the joint committee of management of the asylum on 14th January last, in compliance with the regulations made by the Local Government Board on the subject.

SNEEM (COUNTY KERRY) POLICE FORCE.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the ordinary police force at Sneem, county Kerry, has been increased lately; and if so, what is the cause of the increase; whether Mr. Warden has now or had at any time lately police protecting his house; and if so, on what grounds; and whether, considering the present condition of the district of Sneem, he will make representations to have the extra police force withdrawn.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The ordinary police force at Sneem has recently been

EXTRA SUBJECTS—REMUNERATION OF TEACHERS.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he will state what is the scale of remuneration to be paid to teachers in the national schools of Ireland for extra subjects, sanctioned only out of school hours, a list of which is issued by the Commissioners of National Education.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The scale of remuneration and mode of payment for extra branches have not yet been determined by the Commissioners.

MONITORS IN IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether gratuities for the instruction of monitors will be paid to Irish national teachers as usual this year, and when will the result of their examination be made known to those monitors who attended the examinations held during last Easter week at the different district centres.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Gratuities due on account of monitors' instruction for the past year will be paid to the teachers in all cases. The results of their examination at Easter will be made known to the monitors without delay.

IRISH COUNTY SURVEYORS.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state whether county surveyors and deputy county surveyors are compelled under the Local Government (Ireland) Act to devote their whole time to the service and work of the county councils in Ireland; and, whether the office of county surveyor and deputy county surveyor are pensionable offices or otherwise.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Existing county and assistant county surveyors hold their office on the same terms and conditions as heretofore. County councils cannot prohibit them from undertaking private practice if they are able to do so without neglecting the duties of their office. I understand, however, that since the passing of the Local Government Act, 1898, the surveyors have had time for private practice owing to increased duties. In the case of appointments there would be no prevent councils from stipulating the persons appointed should devote entire time to their duties. The of county surveyor and assistant surveyor are pensionable, the former 38 and 39 Vict., c. 56, and the under Section 83, Sub-section II, Act of 1898. But no surveyor after the passing of the Act of 1898 obtain a superannuation allowance he has given his whole time to the office of the county, and assistant surveyor must also devote their whole time to service of the county to qualify for annuities allowance.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE—STANDING ORDERS.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when it is intended to make any change in the Standing Orders of the House that notices of Motions may not be discussed in the House or importance.

I also desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, as Members of the House generally are deprived of opportunity of moving any Amendment in the case of Bills which are without Amendment by Standing Orders, he will consider the effect of such an alteration in the procedure as will secure that all Amendments are considered whether amended or not, and whether considered on Report in the House.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, N.E.): I think the hon. Member is right that at the present period of these are subjects which it is for us to take up.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION (ISLE OF MAN).

Bill to extend The Elementary School Teachers (Superannuation) Act, 1898, to Teachers serving in the Isle of Man and to service as a Teacher in that Island, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jesse Collings and Secretary Sir Matthew White Ridley.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION (ISLE OF MAN) BILL.

"To extend the Elementary School Teachers (Superannuation) Act, 1898, to Teachers serving in the Isle of Man and to service as a Teacher in that Island," presented, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 305.]

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION (JERSEY).

Bill to extend The Elementary School Teachers (Superannuation) Act, 1898, to Teachers serving in the Island of Jersey and to service as a Teacher in that Island, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jesse Collings and Secretary Sir Matthew White Ridley.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION (JERSEY) BILL.

"To extend The Elementary School Teachers (Superannuation) Act, 1898, to Teachers serving in the Island of Jersey and to service as a Teacher in that Island," presented, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 306.]

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): This Bill is introduced with special regard to the recommendations of the Viceregal Commission appointed to inquire into the system of intermediate education in Ireland. That Commission made a very thorough inquiry into the whole subject; it took a large amount of evidence, and ultimately brought forward a valuable and unanimous Report. It is necessary that I should describe in the conclusions at which it arrived. Speaking generally, it reported in the direction of attaching less importance to individual results and more importance to tests of general efficiency as a measure of the grant that is made to a school. How far legislation is necessary to give effect to its recommendation is a doubtful matter: on one point certainly it is requisite, and I think we may take it for granted that the Commissioners would not be disposed to give effect generally to the recommendations which they made in the absence of special legislation enabling them to do so. The proposal is to give powers of a general character to the Board—powers which will enable them to apply portions of the funds at their disposal for the purpose of secondary education in a manner provided by rules to be made by the Board with the approval of the Lord. It has been deliberately drafted in that form because it seemed to the Government that the provisions of Clause 1 would give sufficient safeguards against the abuse of the powers so conferred. In addition, it was thought desirable to give them greater freedom than they possess if their policy was limited and circumscribed by the recommendations made in the Report. I am still of opinion that in that form would be a more liberal measure than one limited to the recommendations of the Committee. It is impossible to say definitely what fresh education measures may take. Just as considerable difference has been shown in the opinions of those in charge of intermediate education, so in the next few years similar differences may arise. I have been intimated to me that in the form the Bill might prove objectionable, and that the element of controversy might be removed if in the Committee stage the Government were prepared to accept Amendments confining the Bill to the recommendations made by the Commissioners. In the circumstances I shall be prepared to accept that concession to the object of the Bill, and having given that:

that the Second Reading of the Bill taken without very much further discussion. The measure will constitute an important step, not only in the cause of secondary education in Ireland, but in the use of education generally in Ireland. Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. G. W. Balfour.)

JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): The circumstances under which the Bill has been brought to a Second Reading such as will probably prevent any contention over its provisions. A dealing with this subject cannot, however, be disposed of in a few minutes; there must be some reasonable discussion of the subject. I do not think it would be possible for a more important and interesting subject connected with Ireland to be brought before the House. It is some twenty years since the intermediate system of education was established in Ireland, and ample time has elapsed to enable the Irish people generally to judge of its merits and demerits, and with regard to the system, the public opinion of Ireland has come to three clear conclusions. I believe that public opinion has come almost unanimously to the conclusion that, looking at the system broadly, it has worked a very great deal of good in the secondary education of the country. It has certainly put an end to the apathy and stagnation which prevailed in Irish schools twenty-five years ago. Interest in the school work has quickened, and emulation has been stimulated and improved. Boys at school work with a keener zest than they did twenty-five years ago, and the standard of secondary education has been greatly improved in every school throughout the country. Not the least valuable feature of the system is that it has enabled high-class secondary education to be imparted to the children of poorer parents—education which it was very difficult for them to obtain before the intermediate system was introduced. The Irish people under these circumstances are prepared to admit that the system has been of enormous benefit. But it is equally clear to them that this intermediate system has grave defects which have been apparent to everybody, and I say the fact that we have had to wait over twenty years for a remedy for these defects points to the most serious defect of all—the centralised and irresponsible educational control which has been set up. The Board of Education which exercises control over the education of the country consists of seven gentlemen, and although I dislike intensely alluding unnecessarily to any question of religion, I feel bound to point out that of these seven gentlemen four are Protestants and three Catholics, and it seems rather a strange thing that Protestants should preponderate on a Board which is administering education to boys the overwhelming majority of whom are Catholics. This Board is exclusively appointed by the Government, and its history for the last twenty years shows that it has been for the most part absolutely out of touch with educational opinion in Ireland. Certainly the headmasters of the schools in Ireland have had no voice whatever in the management of examinations or any other matter connected with the work of the Department. I believe it is not overstating the case to say that for the most of those twenty odd years, certainly for the last ten years, no member of the Board has had any personal experience whatever of secondary education in Ireland. I think that is a system thoroughly unsound. The gravest defect of all is that the constitution of this educational control is wrong. It is, I believe, without parallel in any country in Europe. I do not think there is another instance in Europe of an educational board of this kind which has not associated with it a consultative council, upon which the opinions of practical educationists are represented. I do not pretend to be completely familiar with the educational systems of Europe, but I do not believe that in any country there is an Education Board appointed by the Government having no association with practical education, as happens to be the case in Ireland. Even here in England—England that is always so slow to move in these matters—this Continental system was adopted last year. An Education Act was passed for England which created a consultative council, to consist, so far as two-thirds of its members were concerned, of persons qualified to represent the views of universities and other bodies interested in education. The first consultative council includes such authorities as Mr. Dyke Acland, Sir William

Anson, Mrs. Sophy Bryant, Sir William Hart Dyke, Professor Michael Foster, Professor Jebb, Mr. Ernest Gray, Professor Owens, and others. With such a precedent, surely a similar system might be extended to Ireland, and you might give us a consultative council charged with the duty of advising the Board on educational matters. We have a precedent nearer at home. I see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the South Division of the County of Dublin in his place. Last year a measure was passed constituting the Department of which he is the head, and a provision was inserted in it for the creation of a consultative council to advise him on matters of technical education. The principle having, therefore, been adopted in England, and to a certain extent in Ireland, I submit that it should be extended to the Intermediate Education Board, as until that is done that Board will continue, as it is, I believe, to-day, to be very largely out of touch with educational opinion throughout the country. This is a reform which, for my part, I feel sure is bound to come in the very near future. This Bill, however, does not propose any reform of this character at all. As the right hon. Gentleman has most frankly stated, it, on the contrary, confers new and enlarged powers on this centralised and irresponsible Board. As it is drawn, it enormously increases the powers of the Board, and if it be passed as it stands it will give for all time to the Board of Intermediate Education, however it may be constituted in the future, absolute power to spend its endowments in any way it likes. That is a proposal which I certainly cannot agree to, neither do I believe that the Irish Members of this House will assent to it. If the constitution of the board were amended in the way I have suggested, by associating with it a consultative council, then the objection to giving enlarged powers to this Board would almost entirely disappear; but so long as the Board is constituted as at present I believe Irish representatives would be false to their duty, and false to the best interests of education in Ireland, if they agreed to pass a measure such as this, giving the Board absolute plenary powers. This Board may or may not command public confidence. Nobody can tell what its constitution in the future may be, and it certainly seems a rather startling proposition that we should be asked to pass a blank cheque to enable it to do as it likes henceforward. This Bill to give power to the Board to do as it likes, not merely with the results of education but also with the methods of education in every school in Ireland. The schoolmaster, in fact, will have absolutely no voice in the matter, and therefore I say that in my opinion it would be a most unwise and foolish thing for the Irish representatives to give the Board power to carry out Amendments in their system of education, of which we know nothing, and which will be submitted for our judgment. I therefore cannot agree to the Bill in its present form. With its main object, however, I am in perfect accord. The object is plain. The history of the intermediate system is in many respects curious. For upwards of twenty years public opinion has been clamouring for change in the Education Board, and an anti-reform section of that Board, if I so call it, has been successful in preventing any reform whatever. At last, by the exertions of some members of the Board, it was induced to ask the late Lieutenant for an inquiry into the present system, and the House will be amazed when I recall the fact that the inquiry that the Board asked for was to be directed by itself; in other words, the Board of Intermediate Education asked that members of its own body should appoint a Commission to inquire into the defects or the merits of the system it was administering. The Intermediate Education Commission which sat in 1881, therefore, a Commission consisting only of members of the Board of Intermediate Education. The inquiry, though held under such advantageous circumstances, still is the most valuable. It was held in the year of day, and by the very force of the circumstances the Board were obliged to examine as witnesses all those associated most closely with educational interests in Ireland, with the result that every part of the system was brought under the searchlight, and the greatest possible light let in on its merits on the one side, and its defects on the other. The Commission—rather to my surprise, I confess, knowing all the elements on the Board—unanimously agreed to a Report of a most valuable character, setting forth a number of important reforms—reforms for which people have been clamouring for past. It would not be right for attempt to make this an opportunity prolonged consideration of it, but I might say in passing that the Government ought to give Members a proper opportunity of making the recommendations in that Bill. Those recommendations, when some new rules under this Bill, are to be laid upon the Table for use for a certain number of days we know by experience that it does not mean a proper and sufficient opportunity for discussing them of that sort. They will come on the right day when there is no real opportunity for discussion, and I think it is only fair if I ask the right hon. Member on behalf of the Government to show some sort of understanding that for forty days, or whatever may be the number of days during which the rules are on the Table elapse, a fair opportunity should be given for their discussion. If we have no such opportunity before us I am afraid we will be unable to consider and discuss them properly—a course which will be in the interest of the measure. All I have to say is summed up in two or three points. The chief complaint against the system of intermediate education is that it led merely to a cramming of the memory, that it did not develop the intellect, that it simply crammed the system of competition. The system of competition, of exclusively written examinations, were very largely regarded as the cause of the deplorable results undoubtedly have followed. I think the first three recommendations of the Report as of enormous importance as to the two provisions which will enable boys to obtain the benefit of the system by training themselves on a commercial than on a classical basis, and the first two provisions are calculated to put an end to the system of cramming, which has had very bad effects in the working of the system in Ireland. It is important from this point of view the recommendation which provides certain cases for viva voce as well as written examinations, and in certain cases that the test of the efficiency of a school should not be solely, as at present, the results of the examinations, but should depend upon a certain modified inspection. These are some of the main recommendations in the Report, and it would be very foolish for anyone interested in secondary education in Ireland to throw any obstacle in the way of those recommendations being carried into effect. I must, however, take this opportunity of expressing the deep regret universally entertained in Ireland that there is nothing in the Report dealing with the study of Irish. Some years ago the marks allotted to Irish in the programme of the Intermediate Board were suddenly, and without any valid reason, being given, reduced, and they are to day considerably below those awarded for French, German, or other languages. It is a monstrous thing that the language of the country, the ancient language of Ireland, should in this way be proscribed in the system of intermediate education, and that it should be on a lower level than the languages of the Continent. If it were in my power, I would be delighted to have an opportunity of moving some Amendment that would insert in the new rules which will be based on these recommendations, a provision that the marks for Irish should be raised to the standard at which they stood before, or at least be equal to those given for French or German. Let me, however, briefly sum up the position I take on this Bill. I am quite willing—I am anxious—that the Board should have given to them the necessary powers to carry out the recommendations of their own Report, and if the Bill is amended in the direction indicated by the right hon. Gentleman so as to limit these powers to carrying out those recommendations, I think it will be the duty of Irish representatives not only not to throw any obstacle in the way of this Bill, but to facilitate its passage into law. I have drafted an Amendment on this subject, which I propose to put on the Paper, and a copy of which I have handed to the Government. I do not ask for any pledge that the Government will accept the precise terms of that Amendment, but I do expect the right hon. Gentleman to give us a pledge that in Committee an Amendment carrying out the substance of my proposal will be either proposed or accepted by the Government. My suggested Amendment runs in this way—

“And so far as may be required, in order to carry into effect the several recommendations contained in the Report of the Intermediate Education Commission presented to Parliament in 1899, may from time to time apply a portion of the funds placed at the disposal of the Board," and so on.

The Bill, as it stands, enables them in future to dispose of the money under their control in any way they like, while the Amendment I suggest limits their power to the spending of the money in the carrying out of those particular recommendations embodied in the Report, which are before us, and of which we approve. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to promise that he would accept in substance that Amendment, and on that understanding I hope the Bill will be passed into law. I may be asked why, if I take so strong a view as I have expressed about the constitution of this Board, should I agree to enlarge its powers at all? The answer is very plain. We all want the constitution of the Board altered, and I am strongly in favour of associating with it such a consultative council as exists elsewhere. But I have to ask myself—are we, therefore, to postpone all the reforms for which we have asked and waited for the last twenty years? We desire to see the recommendations of this Report carried into effect, and the only way they can be carried into effect is by passing this Bill with the alteration I have suggested. I should, therefore, on the understanding given, support the second reading, and I think it would be a wise course generally for Irish Members to take the same line, in the hope that thereby we may obtain valuable reforms in the system, and that in the constitution of the Board in future we may be able to obtain such a reform as I have indicated.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I rise to perform once again the ungrateful task of criticising the drafting of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman opposite has told us that this Bill does not provide for the preservation of the Irish language. I think, at any rate, judging from this Bill, that the English language has become almost a dead tongue in Parliamentary drafting. The first section of the Bill begins—

"Notwithstanding anything in the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act, 1878, or the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act, 1890—" notwithstanding anything in those two Acts—therefore, before I come to this

Mr. John Redmond.

Bill at all I have to know exactly those two Acts. Then I read Section 4—

"This Act may be cited as the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act, 1900, and the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act, 1878, and this Act shall be construed as one Act and may be cited collectively as the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act, 1900."

Therefore I have got four Acts together before I can come to a ledge of what is enacted. That is enough, but let me come back to the clause—

"Notwithstanding anything in the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act, 1878, Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act, 1890, portion of the funds—"

What portion? A small portion? A large portion? Some portion? A word omitted? It must be Irish.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth): It was Irish it would be intelligible.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Can it be here put in English it is intelligible. You cannot say "portion," you can say, "a portion," "some portion," "any portion." It may be added, it does not appear so to me; I will say.

"—portion of the funds placed at the disposal of the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act, 1878, and to Section 7 of 1878—"

First of all you say, "notwithstanding anything" in that Act, and now you say it is as part of the Act. This is to be another instance of the same thing by reference which has been so often condemned in this House. I do not know how the English or the Irish General would deal with such a matter if they had to refer to Commandments or the Ten Commandments. I suppose he would be withstanding anything in the chapter of Exodus, the word should be inserted in the law, and then I suppose he would say the Act shall not extend to it. I sometimes ask myself whether I know what they have in mind. Here is another point to which of the Chief Secretary. of Clause 1 provides—made in pursuance of this section before both Houses of Parliament six weeks after the same have been assented to, when the same shall be then sitting, or if not then sitting, within three sessions then next ensuing."

of the session? Is that to make that passage intelligible follow the example set in the same phrase and insert—six weeks after the commencement of the session."

BALFOUR: That is the

ON BOWLES: If that is the form, then it is not intelligible; not plain, and such words should be put into an Act of Parliament—another instance of slovenly it is neither English nor should we not think the Education Committee will understand this law, the man who comes down to give practical instruction will not be able to understand it. I protest against the rafting, for the object of a Bill should be to render that complicated distinct and clear, which is involved plain, so that everybody can understand exactly what laws they are enacting.

M. HEALY reminded the Committee for King's Lynn that the object of drafting a Bill was that everybody should understand it. Had it not been the speech of the hon. Member that he should have been in opposition to the measure. He was not aware of the number of schools that had grown up under the system of examinations in Ireland in the teaching of modern languages.

In order to obtain passes for pupils were instructed to profess French language as it was not "cramming," he could not expect pupils could learn anything without cramming. The system as proposed to abolish had been compared with the system which was intended to introduce any rule which could get over the question of personnel? The laws which were passed for Ireland were good enough until they reached the judges. The rules under this Act might be of a splendid and impartial character, but the moment they got away from the practice of this competitive system and entered upon the question of personnel, then came in religious and political controversy, and the schools would consider whether the inspector was a Protestant or a Catholic, whether he was a Jesuit or a member of the Nonconformist conscience. Under the system proposed to be set up they would have at once, unless the inspectors were almost on a level with the angels, a burning controversy. They had been told that for the first time they were going to have superannuation. He did not know how this superannuation would scale off all this earthly dross. Suppose they appointed as an inspector a most learned, a most pious, and the most perfect Jesuit possible to examine an Orange school—say, in Sandy Row—in the elements of Euclid. The whole of the pupils might find themselves "plucked" by the new examiner. In that case was there an organ in Belfast that would not be ready to contend that this result had ensued because a Jesuit inspector had been sent down? He would take another case. They had at the present time, earning large sums, Jesuit schools in certain parts of the country. Supposing they sent down some hard and fast examiner from the north of Ireland, with very strong theological views, to examine a Catholic school in Cork which had hitherto earned large prizes, was it supposed that they would not have the suggestion made that the inspector was a person of religious bias? He saw the other day, in a paper in the south of Ireland, where it was the custom to have an examination in the Catholic catechism, that several columns were occupied with attacks on the clergyman conducting the examination, whose fairness was called into question. That was amongst Catholics. Now it was proposed, in regard to a Board composed of four Protestants and three Catholics, to set up a system which was to give satisfaction to both sides. He would ask anybody who had considered the subject to consider the personnel of the examiners, even under the competitive system. Papers were set, and secretly set, and there had been no imputation whatever of unfairness, and so far as he knew there had been no complaint whatever of the existing competitive system. But it was a strange fact that at the very moment this competitive system was instituted nearly all the examiners were Protestants. Taking the entire body of examiners who had been conducting the competitive system in Ireland for the last twenty years, it was an extraordinary thing that the learned persons set to conduct the examinations nearly all belonged to the general minority of the people in Ireland. His hon. and learned friend had mentioned the names of the members of that Commission, and undoubtedly they were all very eminent men. For his part he protested against judges of the land being appointed members of that body. Why did they not mind their own business? To tell him that a lawyer of the eminence of the Chief of the Bar had not enough to do in his own court, and that he had to fill up his leisure time and amuse himself in setting problems for the benefit of the youth, when he had problems enough to discuss in his own court, was an absurdity, and a gross absurdity. Either the judges had enough to do or they had not. If they had not enough to do, abolish them. If they had enough to do, do not go to the farce of suggesting that men of that laborious occupation could really engage themselves in business of this kind. Take Mr. Justice Mathew. He was no doubt a very distinguished Shakesperian scholar, and a very eminent man in many ways; but was it suggested that he had not enough to do on the bench, or that he ought to be supposed to occupy the Long Vacation in considering these educational problems? Had the Lord Provost of Trinity College not enough to do? The O'Connor Don was a man of leisure, a gentleman and a Catholic, and was a proper appointment from the point of view of a man having time on his hands. Then there was the Rev. Mr. Martin, of the Theological College, Belfast. He knew nothing for or against him, but he thought he should be a gentleman sufficiently employed in the Theological College. Of Mr. David G. Berkeley he had never heard, and he did not know whether he came from Belfast or Bantry; and there was the Archbishop of Dublin. The majority were hostile in religion and politics to the majority of the people of Ireland. They were told that in ordinary times Ireland was a hotbed of controversy,

Mr. T. M. Healy.

but yet a large number of persons of different persuasion to that of the majority of the people were appointed to these positions. He would be well pleased to have this Bill deferred to another year, and then, perhaps, in a new Bill, the Government might bring forward a Bill for the entire revision of the competitive system. They had stood it since 1878, and for his part he would be prepared to bear the burden for another twelve months. The final objection he had to make was that he entirely protested against this scheme. The fact was an office-seeker in Ireland wanted a job; when he got the job he wanted an advance in salary; and when he got an advance he wanted a pension. The office-seekers were all delighted when they got the jobs, and they were perfectly satisfied; then their power became really overpowering, and they claimed an advance of salary, and when they got that they wanted a pension. Who were these gentlemen? Let their names be known. Thoms' Directory is rather vague on the subject, but he went back this: that every man who wanted a pension under the Bill was a Tory and a Protestant. That he was sure of because there was no fear that the Government would go out of their way to give pensions to Catholics and Nationalists. The Bill, as the Member for King's Lynn complained, was very vague in its drafting; but when he read it, the pension scheme would be a further diminution of the Irish Church surplus. The Bill stated that the Board may, if they think fit, order the funds at their disposal," which, of course, meant the funds out of the Taxation Account—which was to the extent an ear-marked Imperial Fund and the Irish Church surplus. Not a penny would be placed on John Bull; but he was too much engaged in South Africa and China, and of course the losses in must be taken into account. This was for the second time in this session that he had a raid made on the Irish Church surplus for the benefit of a particular class in Ireland. He protested against it. He thought these gentlemen had done well out of the country. They had very little to do in making out examination papers. Look at a list of examination papers available. There were the Home Civil Service examination paper, the examination ab-commissioners in Ireland, which recently brought before the House, the Indian Civil Service examination papers. The officials would only to copy from them, and for that they to be given pensions. There was a deal to be said for the view of the League and other societies of that namely, to block these Bills and insist on their own views. The Government sooner or later would give and, perhaps, if they would give pensions, the Government would give in Irish, or something of that.

If they promised the pensions the Government might even agree to the teaching of the Irish language, and in that in another session, and, perhaps, in the next Parliament, they might get what was wanted. His own view was entirely that the passing of the Bill, and he thought that it was to be regretted that the Government had not determined to forward a comprehensive reform of the system now in force.

MR. LECKY (Dublin University): After an exceedingly long and full inquiry, at which all creeds and classes in Ireland were heard, the members of the Intermediate Board, among whom were Archbishop Walsh and the Provost of Trinity College, came to a unanimous conclusion on this matter, and I believe that this scheme was drawn up by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin and the representatives of the Church of Ireland and the Presbyterian Church. I do not suppose that anyone imagines that the Intermediate system in Ireland is, or ever will be, a perfectly ideal one under existing conditions. In working an united system of three creeds we must look not only to questions of efficiency, but quite as much to questions of religion. We must oftentimes duplicate officials, not because they are wanted, but because they belong to different creeds. Examiners must be changed over and over again for the same reason, and under these circumstances you will never get an ideal system. All classes in Ireland are agreed that the system of payment by results, which some years ago was popular, has been carried to an extent which is extremely injurious to the best schools of Ireland, and the real point in this Bill is to substitute payment after inspection to a great extent for payment by results. The three most eminent members of the three different creeds in Ireland are all agreed that this very important change is for the benefit of the poor children for whom this intermediate system is intended, and I earnestly hope that these proposals, having been received with complete harmony in Ireland by members of different creeds, will not be obstructed or opposed by hon. Members, and that this piece of good work for Ireland may be carried into effect during the present session.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I confess I hold what I know to be a somewhat extreme view on this question. I go so far as to differ from the hon. Member for Waterford in what he says as regards the effect that has been produced by the results system in Ireland. I am a bigot on this subject, I admit. I believe, although it is a deplorable thing to have to say, that intermediate education in Ireland is worse to-day than it was fifty years ago. I do not expect any Irishman to agree with me, but I do believe that we have been going backwards. I believe our fathers had better schools in Ireland than we have at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University, whose authority on these matters is great, and who, whenever he devotes himself to a speech on education or literature, is always listened to by hon. Members on these benches with the respect and interest he deserves, drew in his speech a most melancholy picture of the state of Irish education. He seems to accept it as inevitable that Ireland should for all futurity be condemned to the miserable circumstances which have placed the education of that country in a deplorable position. He said practically that all the evils connected with education in Ireland arose from a conflict of religions and the rival claims of different persuasions. I will tell the House what has been the root, in my judgment, of the unsatisfactory position of the intermediate and every other system of education in Ireland. It is that when the Intermediate Education Act was passed in 1878 no man ever thought for a single moment of considering it from an educational point of view. The Bill was dealt with by the Government and by the House, as all Irish educational questions are dealt with, from the point of view of rival factions in Ire-recommendations of the Board in its own Report, and it seems to me that we would be clearly in order in discussing the nature of the recommendations, because there is no object in introducing the Bill except to carry out these recommendations.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is entitled to advance arguments to show that the Board ought not to be entrusted with larger powers, but he is going far beyond that. It is irregular to anticipate what the regulations as to teaching Irish may turn out to be, and so to discuss the teaching of the Irish language as if it were the substantial question before the House.

MR. DILLON: The point which I was trying to address to the House was this. In the past history of the Board they started by putting the Irish language upon the same level as French and German. It is a permissive subject, and that is the policy of the Board. There is no compulsion for any child coming into an Irish school to learn the Irish tongue.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member is going beyond the scope of the Bill.

MR. DILLON: Then I fail to see what we are to discuss on this Bill, and I shall be much obliged if the Chief Secretary or somebody else will explain to us. This is a Bill to give large powers to the Board. If we are not entitled to criticise the Board or to discuss the uses which they have made of the powers that they already have, how are we to discuss the question at all? Am I not allowed to go into the history and tell the House the uses they have made of those powers they already have?

*MR. SPEAKER: I have said that the hon. Member is entitled to show that the Board ought not to be entrusted with large powers, but the hon. Member is not entitled, because there is a particular subject with which the Board will have to deal in the regulations, to treat that subject as a topic for general discussion upon this Bill.

Mr. Dillon.

MR. DILLON: Then I wish this Board has placed the Irish upon the plane of French and German; that is to say, on the plane of the tongue; and I think upon that ground are not justified in trusting the future. I now turn to one point out of it which, I think, is in order. This Bill proposes, in Clause 2 a certain method by which the Board is to exercise its power. There is nothing in the Bill laying down the conditions under which intermediate education is to be conducted in Ireland in the future, but it is perfectly obvious that the object of the Bill is to place in the hands of the Board the power to alter in the most radical manner the whole system of intermediate education in Ireland. I am in hearty sympathy with the resolution, but I think I am entitled to examine the machinery proposed to carry this into effect. The Bill prescribes that it should be effected by a Bill which shall lie on the Table of the House for forty days. I say that the new system of education under these new rules is illusory and absurd, and early next year—for the rules will not be out this year—we ought to get a pledge that the Government will be given to discuss the new system when all these matters, which are of great importance to our people, ought to be fairly and fully discussed. I will put the matter a little further, and I would ask the Government to make this departure: I would ask them to place upon the Table of the House some Vote—I care not how small—of £100 a year—by way of an aid towards this matter, so that we may, from year to year, have an opportunity to discuss the system of intermediate education in Ireland, as we are not right to discuss primary education. I think that is only reasonable, and that it should be governed by a Board over which the Government has no control, and upon which the people of Ireland are only represented by a minority.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): I think that when the hon. Gentleman puts himself as a bigot on this Bill, he is hardly doing himself justice. His inability his (Mr. Rentoul's) misapprehension led him to take a view of the subject which would not be had not given the same study science. While the Commission go to inquire into this matter, man of great eminence wrote to number of his professional brethren and Dublin upon the question, and from all a reply which spoke of the terrible evil that was intermediate education in Ireland. These were far more important to than any evidence that was before the Commission, and why it was not published in any newspaper did not know. It was from the point of view that this Bill ought to be considered, and therefore he could not begin with the first of the three proposed down by the hon. Member for Lifford. The hon. Member said the system of intermediate education had been in vogue since 1879 had not done good. No doubt the hon. Member spoke from his own experience; hon. Gentlemen compare their own with his. The hon. Gentleman's remark was that boys work with stupidity; that he emphatically and flatly denied. In the schools before this system of intermediate education was started—the assiduity of the pupils just as great as at the present time; he had been a pupil at four Irish schools and had once had opportunities to see many in connection with prize examinations, and he had taken a great interest in this subject. Bribery with reluctance—and he regarded these examinations as bribery—had been rampant in Ireland since 1879. It was the bribery and prostituting education dragging it down from the level on which it ought to stand. Cultivation of the intellect ought to be of the same importance to the cultivation of the soul, though it required a metaphysician than himself to do it. The one ended and the other began; he almost despaired when bribery and fraud were so rampant. They would as well offer bribes to people to neglect their religious duties. The hon. Member then said that the standard of education had been raised, and there, his experience did not coincide with the opinion of the hon. Gentleman. As he could point out that the intermediate schools, both before and since the Bill, had been preparing students for the universities and colleges, but, so far as he could see, the standard of examination necessary to obtain a scholarship in the three Queen's colleges had not improved. The standard of education had not been improved at all. If the standard had been raised in the intermediate schools, clearly the standard in the university colleges must have risen too. Some hon. Gentlemen only smiled, and that was because they did not approve of the Queen's colleges, but that had nothing to do with the question. The point was that so long as students came into the colleges from these schools the colleges were the test of the work done in the schools. He found on looking over the list that Queen's College, Galway, had the honour of having more Members in that House than any other university college in the United Kingdom except Christ Church, Oxford, and that being so the scholarships of that college would certainly be the test in the matter. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman said that education by this intermediate system was being extended to the poor. Again he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman, before he repeated that statement, to investigate and find out whether there were more students now going on to university education than before 1879—whether, in fact, the number had increased, and whether intermediate education had done anything in that direction. The hon. and learned Member had said that the system had many grave defects. There he agreed with him at once. He listened with great attention and took great pains to hear what the many defects were, in order to treasure them as the result of the hon. and learned Member's experience of the subject. As far as he could gather, the hon. and learned Member stopped with one of the grave defects, and that was with reference to the seven gentlemen who formed the Board. The grave defect there, in the hon. and learned Gentleman's mind, seemed to be that four members were Protestants and three were Catholics.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: That is a most unfair statement. I only alluded to the constitution of the Board in passing. The real defect in the constitution of the Board to which I drew attention was that it was irresponsible and had not been associated with it, as have other similar Boards elsewhere, anything in the nature of a consultative council.

MR. RENTOUL said he should be extremely sorry to say anything unfair to the hon. and learned Member, but that was how the matter struck him. He did not gather any other objection. He now came to the recommendations of the Commission, and he might refer just in a sentence in passing to the question of teaching the Irish language. He thought that instead of letting children waste their time in learning Irish it would be better to let them learn French and German, or something that would do them some good. As for the statement that the teaching of Irish was desirable on account of its necessity in the investigation of old documents, surely it was rather trifling with a serious debate to put such an argument forward. There were not three of the Irish Members in that House who, in addressing their constituents, could speak fifteen words of Irish. [Several HON. MEMBERS: It is not true.] Hon. Members said the statement was not true. He always liked things to be brought at once to the test. His test was this. Let hon. Members representing Irish constituencies who did speak the Irish language write letters to the newspapers in the Irish language contradicting the statement. A statement of that sort made across the floor of the House did not mean much, and recoiled upon the gentlemen who made it. He recalled to the recollection of hon. Members the statement made only a few weeks ago by the Lord Chief Justice as to the inutility of trying to learn the Irish language. As regarded the Commission, one recommendation was certainly of extreme value. He referred to the recommendation with regard to having a modern school course and a grammar school course. The hon. Member for North Louth had said he did not see very much objection to cramming. He could not help thinking that the hon. Member must attach a different meaning to the word from that which was usual. The word education meant the drawing out of the mental powers, but cramming was the very opposite. What did they mean by cramming as understood technically in schools? They meant that education were prepared, and that they swallowed. A portion of knowledge was taken, and a few questions were put up and tabulated with the answers. Pupils, without understanding the substance of the matter at all, had to commit questions and answers to memory. They knew that was the way preparation was done by cramming. The same was applied to languages. In connection with Latin or Greek, for example, certain words, very odd forms of expressions, were picked out. They were of little value to the scholar, but they were generally picked out as catches, and put down in the examination paper. Hence was made in the debate by the hon. and learned Member to the effect that teaching and examining in modern languages. Anything more futile than this system of teaching could not be imagined. It was a fact that the pupils were allowed to pronounce the word at all, but the attempt to pronounce the word had an evil effect on their spelling, and was cramming. He advised the hon. learned Member to look into the matter of the word cramming. It was a word which was perfectly well-known in the educational world. When a tutor was employed at present to prepare a pupil privately for the intermediate examination, he had known the question asked, "What is a good crammer?" They all knew that cramming was a means of stupidly dwarfing the intellect. If any one tried to encourage cramming there were better means by which it could be done than by the intermediate system as it existed hitherto. Many Irish Members considered that it would have been not a single farthing had been put into intermediate education since 1850, that a vast number of shattered constitutions and early graves were the result of the system. Now a change was being made, but it was impossible to say whether it would be one at all. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University said that no change would be made by very able men, but they did not know what the result would be. It was said that a Report would be laid on the Table, and that they would have time to consider and discuss the rules. They might be discussed at twelve o'clock, and, of course, the discussion took place then the possibility of teaching the con-

most important Bills which this Parliament. To say that the Board were well intentioned men who would do no harm, did not meet the test of the Government of 1879 was to leave on the Statute-book that they themselves would be afterwards ; but it seemed to me that it was worse than useless. Nothing more deplorable in the history of the country is to be perpetually changing. They must give time to grow before they are cut by the roots. He was in favour of the proposal of the Bill ; he would rather see it postponed, or the Commission to exercise whatever power now possessed at their disposal the Bill, than that it should be shelved, as it is. His Bill was passed, for a long time. The hon. Member Mayo had, as usual, made to make some reference to it. It was, however, rather late at he did not look more the result of his argument. Why is not this matter left to the different denominations the Irish to manage their own. But that was exactly what the Intermediate Board. The Board was composed of twenty, every one of whom was

N : Nominated by Dublin

MR. RENTOUL : What does that mean? Were seven men of great distinction that did it matter if they were nominated by Dublin Castle, so long as they were nominated? If a Home Rule Parliament would in all probability select these very men. There were many of them who could possibly be objectionable to such a Parliament.

MR. RENTOUL explained that his point never was nominated or he was responsible to a body of the people.

MR. RENTOUL : This Intermediate Education Board is responsible to this House. ["No."] Then what does this Bill mean?

MR. DILLON : It is not responsible. Ask the Chief Secretary.

MR. RENTOUL contended that if the House had power to disestablish the Board at any moment, to take away its emoluments, and to change its functions, surely the Board must be responsible to the House. The hon. Member for East Mayo was therefore only weakening his argument by bringing in Home Rule by such a side wind. It would be fair enough to say that these seven gentlemen, having acted on a system for twenty years, had become more or less wedded to that system—

MR. DILLON : I am sorry to interrupt, but I do not want to be misrepresented as to my attitude towards these gentlemen. These gentlemen have acted on a system imposed upon them by this House. They are not wedded to that system, because they are now seeking power to depart from it. The hon. and learned Gentleman is therefore misrepresenting me in this matter. What I was trying to bring out were the evil results of not having some administrative body conducting the education of the country responsible to public opinion in Ireland.

MR. RENTOUL would not willingly misrepresent the hon. Member, but that was how he understood his argument. The position taken by the hon. Member for Waterford in support of the Bill was not one in which he would be backed by the public generally. The question was whether this large grant of money was well or ill spent. Opinion upon that subject varied along a considerable line. Some people held that the Intermediate Grant had been the greatest educational curse of any land or age. That was one extreme. The other was that the grant had been the greatest possible boon to the people of Ireland. Moderate people, however, who had studied the matter had come to the conclusion that the grant as at present administered was of no value to the country, and that a complete and drastic change was needed. The question was, would that change be made by the Report which would be laid on the Table? And if it was not, would there be any opportunity in which the matter could be fully discussed, so that something might be done which would be of permanent value to the country?

SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I shall not detain the House at any length, but I must express my agreement with one observation, and only one, of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth. I believe this is one of the most important Bills that has been introduced by the present Government or could be introduced by any Government. It is a Bill which will materially affect the education of the youth of Ireland of every class and denomination; and anything that controls and affects the education of the youth of a country determines more than anything else can do the future destiny of that country. I have been a close observer of the working of the Intermediate Education Act, living as I have done in Ireland all my life, and being brought into contact with youths who took advantage of the Act and with youths who were educated before the intermediate system came into operation. The result of my experience is that the Intermediate Education Act was, on the whole, a benefit to Ireland. It was not an unmixed boon, but it was very far from being an unmixed evil. I cannot agree with those who think the general education in Ireland has not progressed under the influence of the Intermediate Education Act; but in saying that I am far from contending that the system is not capable of very great improvement. I may say in passing that it is perfectly vain to expect that youths can be stimulated to a great amount of work and exertion unless some species of prize or inducement is held out to them. There may be individuals of such very superior temperament and constitution as under the ideal of the celebrated Dr. Arnold might enter the arena of study and reach the goal without any material inducement being held out to them. But such are the few and the exception, and we must legislate for the average of human nature. It is not merely to youths, but also to every stage of life. The majority of kind are striving for garters, ribbons, or decorations, and they go great risks and perils in the struggle. I have often heard with regard to examinations of the "Oh, what a desperate system this is!" Cramming may be about; cramming really is nothing but doing yourself night and day to certain ends of study which are set before you, wards, when you are subjected to examination, the result of that toil and comes forth, and the industrious is singled out from the idle boy.

MR. RENTOUL: That is not a cramming means.

SERJEANT HEMPHILL: We do not dispute about words. I do not understand cramming to mean anything drawn out of a man, nor do I understand cramming to mean anything drawn out of a man. If that were so, what would be the use of education, the object of education being to improve the intellect and the moral which are essentially human? But to come to the Bill. After the speech of the hon. Member for Waterford I should be very sorry to throw any difficulty in the way of the Second Reading, but whether the Bill be a good or a bad Bill depends upon the rules which are laid under it. I myself would have been glad that it was postponed; I would have seen it brought in as a great scheme regulating the entire system of the education of Ireland. The present system requires overhauling. This is a step towards reaching a system of education which is so much wanted in Ireland and on which the prosperity of the country so much depends. If the Bill is framed in such a way as to give equal advantages to all classes of the community, and if the House has the opportunity for discussing and settling those rules, I see in this Bill the germ of what may turn out to be a very valuable measure, and in that view I support the Second Reading.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, The hon. and learned Member for Down) said that he did not know were going to be made by the Commissioners if this Bill passed. If I am in a similar state of ignorance I vote against the Second Reading measure; but I wish to state in the name of the Government what I understand to be the actual state of the Bill in its present form would be the Intermediate Board to make rules they liked at any time in accordance to the duties they have to perform.

To that proposition I offer the strongest possible opposition. The hon. Member for Waterford stated, however, the Government had agreed to an Amendment limiting the power of the Commissioners to make rules on the lines of the recommendations contained in their Report. That being so, we are not in ignorance of what the Commissioners are going to do. We do not know exactly what they are going to do, but we do know the main lines upon which their work will proceed.

I am wrong in that, I will vote against the Second Reading, but otherwise I shall vote for it. I have no hesitation in saying that if any rule is made contravening the general recommendations of the Report it will be a breach of faith on the part of the Government and of the Commissioners. If, however, as the right hon. Gentleman has indicated, it will be absolutely illegal to make any rules contrary to those recommendations, I have the strongest reason for supporting the Bill, because I approve of those recommendations. I think there is no difference of opinion on that point. Nobody, except the hon. and learned Member for North Louth, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken, has defended cramming, and I am not sure that either of those two Gentlemen would defend cramming properly understood.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: I do not defend cramming. I gave a definition of what I understood cramming to mean.

MR. CLANCY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman does not defend the system by which at present subjects of comparatively little use are taught, and he does not defend the physical injuries resulting from overwork in connection with examinations. Nobody in the House defends those things, and the recommendations of the Report go to remedy those defects, and when I know that the Bill will simply enable those recommendations to be carried out I have no hesitation in supporting the Second Reading.

SIR JAMES HASLETT (Belfast, N.) cordially agreed with nearly all that had been said by the hon. Member for Waterford, understanding that all that was intended was to give the Board power to carry out the unanimous recommendations of the excellent Commission that took so much evidence in connection with intermediate education. He looked with a certain amount of fear upon the tremendous power put into the hands of the inspectors to say whether or not the quality of the teaching given by a particular teacher was efficient. He freely admitted that if any consultative system could be married to the existing system, if the Commissioners could come down more immediately to the parties who were to be educated, if they could see more to the detail of the work, if they could appreciate the difficulties of the teachers and thoroughly understand the educational work from that point of view, a very great advance would be made, and he hoped the day was not very far distant when that would be done, and there would be a union or fusion between the governing body of the Education Department in Dublin and the general working body in the particular districts. He was deeply interested in the vexed question of the Irish language. He was in favour of it being taught, but it must be subsidiary to the language which would enable the youth of the country to compete in the struggle of life. Care must be taken that the education given did not in any way interfere with the broadening of the horizon of the youth of the country. By teaching them Irish only, the sphere of their labour would be circumscribed; but if the language were taught as Latin was taught—as a means of understanding the records of the country and the beauties of its literature—it was desirable that every Irishman should have a smattering of his own language. Higher marks, however, must not be given for Irish, and lower marks for Euclid or for French or German—

*MR. SPEAKER drew the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that he was now getting into a discussion of the merits of the Irish language.

SIR JAMES HASLETT thereupon concluded his remarks by saying that he supported the Bill, believing that the rules to be made would be rules to carry out the unanimous recommendations of one of the best Commissions which had ever sat upon this question in Ireland. As the Bill merely empowered the Board to give effect to those recommendations, he thought it was a measure which should receive the sanction of the House.

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): While I quite agree that the promised acceptance of the suggested Amendment of my hon. friend has completely changed our attitude towards this Bill, I think it is nevertheless our duty to protest against this system of treating so important a question as the education of the Irish people by a Bill which on its face really discloses none of its main features, as such a measure should do under the circumstances. It is a very deplorable thing that when a Bill was being introduced the rules in accordance with the Report should not have been presented to the House. I also agree with the hon. Member for East Down that it is much to be regretted that we should enter upon a system of education as an experiment, and that after a year or two the whole system should be completely changed again. As the whole value of the Bill depends upon the rules which will be made under it, it is an extraordinary thing that we are precluded from considering those rules in the present debate, and that we should be precluded in all future debates from considering this entire question of the system of education in Ireland. This Bill enables the Commissioners to do a certain thing, and but for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford, which has been accepted, we should have been hopelessly in the dark, and we should have had no future opportunity of reviewing the system set up by the new rules. I quite agree in the general condemnation of the system of intermediate education as practised up to the present time, but I must confess that I cannot go to the whole extent of entirely condemning the system. I believe a judicious system should combine both the stimulus to the individual pupil and the stimulus to the efficiency of the school as a whole. I could not go at all with the hon. Member for East Down in condemning the giving of prizes as a stimulus to study. I think the hon. Member goes too far, and I do hope that, in the rules which are to be adopted, the general efficiency of the schools will be very much considered, while at the same time the system should be found of inducing pupils to strike out to obtain those prizes of distinction which, after all, have not been injurious to the result. I do not think when this House gives its sanction to these new rules we should have any means of ascertaining whether the system is suitable to the country or not; though I am prepared to support the Second Reading upon the promise which has been given, I do protest against the system of introducing a complete change in the system in the manner which has been adopted, for it commits the House to rules without our knowing exactly what those rules are.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): It is very unfortunate that these rules were not presented along with the Bill. I understand that the Government are not in a position to state the exact rules which have pledged themselves that they shall be laid out on the main lines of the recommendations of the Commission, and that promise meets our view. I think, however, that it is scandalous that we are asked to pass a Bill of this importance in this way. We hope a full opportunity will be given by the Government to discuss this question, not at midnight, but at a proper and reasonable hour. As far as educational matters in Ireland are concerned, owing to the manner in which the Irish Estimates are framed, we never have an opportunity of discussing the educational policy of the Government. In my district I may say that the disappointment will be evinced in the manner in which this subject has been discussed.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): We have no intention of delaying the Bill, but it appears to me that a subject of this importance deserves the of the House of Commons. The mind of the people is really the most important subject that could engage the attention of the legislature at the present time. What do we see when we look to other countries, such as the United States, Germany, or France, or other great legislative bodies? Can any member of this House imagine that the subject of this importance would be dealt with in by such a skeleton Bill, as to principles of this kind, in other Parliaments in the countries I have alluded to? I am not going to enter into detail, but as an Irish Member I speak against this system, for it is not a great subject with that importance which it deserves. This subject of intermediate education which requires immense care and is dealt with by trained educationists. To pass a Bill like this to be accepted without debate is not treating properly this great subject of education. I think the Bill ought to contain more than the carrying out of recommendations of this Commission. The National Board of Education should be constituted as it is at present, for it is really an irresponsible nominated body with extraordinary and extensive expenditure of expending money which is levied by the ratepayers, who have no control whatever over that expenditure as a taxpayer and as a representative of the city of Dublin. I object to that principle. I say that the people should have some control over the National Education, who really manage the whole system of education in Ireland.

It may be alleged that the House of Commons has a certain control over the expenditure. I deny that, because owing to the way the Votes are given for national education, the question of expenditure comes within our purview. We have no opportunity whatever given for controlling the actions of these bodies, and the result is that we have a system of so-called intermediate education which is anti-Irish, and tends to teach the principal thing that an Irishman ought to know. The Irish language is not taught, and I have been requested to ask that Irish should be taught in every national school, and particularly in the southern districts, where the Irish language is usually spoken. I cannot understand why the Commission omitted any reference to a matter upon which there is such a large amount of popular feeling at the present time, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will give us some gleam of hope that this matter will receive attention. I am prepared to vote for the Second Reading, but I do so very unwillingly. I say that the manner in which education in Ireland has been carried out is exceedingly unsatisfactory, and we have no definite guarantee as to what improvement is going to take place except the recommendations of the Committee. These recommendations do not satisfy me, for I think the Irish people ought to have some control over the National Board of Education, and the people should have some control over the funds which they provide. They have neither control nor influence under this Bill, and in this respect it is very unsatisfactory. I have no intention of further delaying the House except to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to give a favourable answer to the request which has been put forward in regard to the teaching of the Irish language. The present system of intermediate education in Ireland has done much harm to the rising generation, because, instead of being given a useful education, they have been taught something which has not enabled them to obtain employment, and the system has been manufacturing an article for which there was no demand. Manual instruction has been altogether neglected, and undoubtedly the results have not been satisfactory. I have no faith in the system of cramming. There was no intermediate system where I was educated, but there was cramming, and I confess the result was that I forgot all about the subject in a very few weeks. The system of cramming is altogether wrong. There is one other matter which to my mind is a very serious defect. Under the present system the smart children are taken out of certain schools and placed in better schools, and I think that is a wrong system. I think every boy and girl ought to get equality of treatment. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will give some expression of opinion as to the constitution of this Board of National Education, which I trust will be made responsible to somebody, for at present they are responsible to nobody. I hope that an opportunity will be given to the House to discuss and debate these rules

so that we may know exactly what system of education is to be introduced in Ireland in the future. Our educational system means either the ruin or the prosperity of the country, for education is the main factor in progress, and a more important thing could not be discussed in this House. The question is non-political and non-sectarian, and every man must be affected by the intellectual progress of the community amongst whom he resides.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork) said that the refusal of the Government and the Education Commissioners to give to Ireland the bilingual system which had been given to Wales was an infamous conspiracy against the Irish language. The Government and the Commissioners appeared to have as much terror of the Irish language as they would have if Mauser Rifles were to be placed in the hands of the people.

MR. SHEE (Waterford, W.): In regard to the Amendment which the Government have agreed to accept, I think it will be very necessary for us to first get the assent of the Government to the suggestion made by the hon. Member for East Mayo in reference to the desirability of giving the House an opportunity of discussing the rules, although they are restricted to the recommendations made by the Commissioners. There is one very important pecuniary question which may arise in regard to the rules which are to be made. Under the system which has hitherto existed the amount given to masters of schools and colleges for results has averaged £50,000 a year, while the amount given to students as prizes has been something less than £18,000 a year. It should be quite possible in making the rules to reduce to a much smaller proportion than £18,000 the amount devoted to prizes for competitors in the class examinations which it is proposed to substitute. I altogether disagree with the right hon. Gentleman in his view that intermediate system has resulted in cramming, because anyone who knows the nature of the questions set in examination papers could not possibly make this mistake, for those questions could not be answered effectively by anybody who had been crammed. The effect of cramming depends upon the kind of questions the examiner puts, and examiners to a great extent prevent or mitigate the existence of the evils of cramming by the nature of the questions they set. It would be a great misfortune for intermediate education if the amount which has hitherto been given to masters should be reduced. Undoubtedly it is not the amount of these fees which has been given to the masters of colleges which has produced the success in the system, but it is the amount given to the pupils which has induced them to pay more attention to their studies than they would under the old system of education which existed in Ireland before the Intermediate Education Act was passed. I believe the result of increased grants to the masters would have a tendency to increase cramming, for it would then be to the advantage of the masters to prepare a small number of pupils, and so prepare in such a way that they would get as the result of the examination a very large proportion of the result fees. The recommendations of the Committee will prevent the adoption of a general pass examination and the possibility of cramming. There is another question which has been mentioned as one of the evils of the intermediate system. I believe that there is real ground for the assertion that there has been over-pressure, which is a different thing to cramming. Over-pressure has existed to a very great extent in the intermediate schools, and the result has been that a great many pupils have been practically ruined in sight and in other ways. Possibly the new system will to some extent diminish this over-pressure. I think the Government ought to consent to the suggestion made by the hon. Member for East Mayo that when the rules have been drafted and laid on the Table of the House we should be given an opportunity of discussing them, because it is possible, with the very wide discretion the Commissioners possess, that they may make rules which would be very objectionable to the people most interested in the system. For that reason I think the House ought to have an opportunity of discussing the rules. It is also very desirable that every year the House should have an opportunity of discussing the question of intermediate education, and of doing so for the public benefit, with the result in which the Commissioners carry

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : This second Bill dealing with education in Ireland has been introduced in order to facilitate the carrying out of a reorganised scheme for the payment of teachers which has been already adopted by the Commissioners of Education, and which is embodied in the Blue-book laid on the Table of the House the other day. Over three-fourths of the sum available for the payment of teachers in Ireland the Commissioners at present have the right of free disposal. It is only as regards a sum of about £250,000 that the Commissioners are in any way limited as to the manner in which it should be distributed. The effect of this Bill, if passed, will be to give the Commissioners the same free hand over the distribution of this £250,000 as they already have over the remaining three-fourths of the total sum available for the payment of teachers. When I introduced this Bill I said that it was not absolutely necessary for the purpose of carrying out the new scheme that the Bill should be passed. Perhaps I ought to explain a little more in detail what I meant by that statement. The payments which the teachers will receive under the schedule will in every case include all the remuneration they now receive. Their present incomes will, as a matter of fact, be covered by the consolidated salaries paid to them under the provisions of this Bill, and the reorganised scheme could have been carried out from a legal point of view without this Bill at all. It may be asked, then, why we have decided to introduce it. One reason is that it is desirable to have this Bill on the Statute-book, because, although it is not necessary for the purposes of the scheme, yet it will remove certain difficulties which, although they do not amount to legal obstacles, it is desirable should be removed. It may be frankly admitted that the schedule did not contemplate consolidated salaries to the teachers, and, therefore, it is just as well that this Bill should be put on the Statute-book. But there is another and more practical reason why this Bill should be passed. Unless it is passed, the Commissioners may be called upon by any teacher to show that, as a matter of fact, the consolidated salary to be paid to him covers the remuneration he now receives. There would be no difficulty in proving that in every case the necessary conditions have been fulfilled, but it would impose a very considerable amount of labour indeed on the staff of the Commissioners. I understand that the Synod of the Church of Ireland have raised certain objections to this Bill, on the ground that it will take away some of the advantages which small schools now possess. In my opinion, and in the judgment of the Commissioners, that view is absolutely unfounded. It is admitted that small schools, having from ten to nineteen pupils, will undoubtedly benefit pecuniarily under the scheme, and I think also that schools having from twenty to twenty-five pupils will also benefit pecuniarily. It is perhaps right that I should call attention to the fact that the Commissioners have not yet published the salaries of the different grades, because a great deal of calculation is required before the salaries can be finally fixed; but I may safely say that the consolidated salaries will cover every part of the teachers' present remuneration, and if the Bill is passed there is absolutely no fear of any injustice being done, or that any teacher in any small school will suffer under the new rules. But, as I have already stated, the Bill is not absolutely necessary for the scheme of the Commissioners, and if there is a disposition on both sides of the House that the Bill should not be insisted on I will give way to that pressure, because the Leader of the House has already stated that it is not our intention to press any of these Irish Bills if they are opposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. SPEAKER: This will be a convenient time to inform the hon. Member for Waterford that the Amendment on the Paper in his name, by which I propose to raise the question of the teaching of the Irish language in elementary schools, is not a new one. The Bill proposes merely to alter the rules under which the distribution of grants-in-aid is now made, and to raise new rules for that purpose. An Amendment raising discussion on subjects or methods of education was out of order.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: After ruling, Sir, it is impossible for me to discuss on this motion the question I am most anxious to raise—namely, the teaching of the Irish language in these schools in Ireland. I must only bow to the ruling, Sir, and postpone that question until to-morrow, when we will have the Education Vote before us. That discussion having been taken away from me, I do not propose to detain the House. The right hon. Gentleman has said that in his opinion this Bill is not absolutely necessary, and that if it was desired by the Irish Members he would have no objection to postponing it. I have had no opportunity of gathering the opinion of the Irish Members on the subject, but I do not think that I am very far wrong in interpreting them to be in favour of the postponement of this Bill. We take a very strong view of the action of the Government in not affording an opportunity of discussing the system of new primary education in Ireland. It is true we may discuss it to-morrow, one sitting is quite insufficient for discussion of the question of the language and also for the discussion of this elaborate system. We are very strongly that we have not been properly treated by the Government on this matter, and as we are prevented from discussing the details of the scheme, I, for my part, think the course would be to let the Bill stand. If necessary, let it be introduced next year, when we will be in a better position to understand the working of the system. For these reasons I will support the adjournment of the debate.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the Government propose, as is suggested, to adopt the motion of the hon. Member, the better course would be to move that the Order the Bill withdrawn. That from the right hon. Gentleman of the Bill.

N: Before the right hon. members, I should like, Sir, to say as to the scope of your Bill see that it has a bearing raised by the hon. Member

I understood you, Sir, as catch your last ruling, to be not within our power to change methods of education in Ireland, if this Bill were introduced we should be debarred from any of the new rules. This Bill is to put it within the Commissioners to alter them of education in Ireland.

CLER: Not to alter the method, but the distribution

N: I am not prepared to let the Bill directly concern subjects, but it does also affect the methods of education, the sole and only object of the Bill is to bring about revolutionary changes to the Bill with reference to national education in Ireland.

CLER: It is not a Bill on methods or subjects of education discussed.

N (Cork, N.): Our difficulty was a question this afternoon, I was chafantly informed that my speech was useless, and that it was impossible to discuss the rules and regulations—they were already in operation—that is the necessity for the Bill. The position is exceedingly serious and would be far better if the Bill were passed.

N: On the question of the Bill, and before the Chief Clerk asks whether he will withdraw or not, I assume I will be in a position to discuss the points mentioned by the hon. Gentleman in introduction. His first point was of principle. He stated that unless the Bill is passed any teacher could petition the Board to prove that the sums to which he was entitled under the old scheme were covered by the gross sum under the new scheme. Therefore one effect of this Bill would be to deprive National teachers of their right under the law to call on the Commissioners to prove that their allocation of salary was accurate. If the Bill passes they will be deprived of that right. I dare say that the new system will be a better system, and that no teacher will really suffer. But that is not the view of the teachers themselves, and I do not think it is unnatural that they should be anxious, when the old system is to be revolutionised, and that they should be unwilling to part with any right they have until they see the actual figures of the new scheme. We know perfectly well that, on the admission of the Treasury themselves, the teachers were by a miscalculation deprived of large arrears, some of which we subsequently got by repeated debates in this House. Anyone who listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman must have realised that the subject is one of great complexity, and it is therefore not at all wonderful that the teachers should be uneasy and unwilling to part with the rights they have until they are satisfied that they will not be damaged by the provisions of the new scheme. As I understood the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he stated categorically that the teachers, if this Bill were passed, would lose the right of calling on the Board to prove that their salaries had not been reduced. I think the hon. Member for Waterford is most wise in calling on the Government to postpone this Bill until we have time to study and consider the figures and details of the new scheme. While I take that view, I think it is only just to state—and I know I am speaking the mind of the hon. Member for Waterford and other Irish Members—that we recognise in this new scheme and these new rules for intermediate education in Ireland a development of a new spirit of educational reform. I regard it as a result of the appointment to the Board of certain individuals whose names I need not mention, and who have brought a new and a better spirit into the Board. We are heartily in sympathy with the main principles of these changes, and while there is no dispute as to principle, I think it is only fair we should take up this attitude in order to safeguard the interests of the teachers and preserve their rights. After your ruling, Sir, it is manifest that this Bill will afford no foothold for discussing the general methods or subjects of education in Ireland. Next session we shall only be able to examine the financial aspects of these changes as they affect the salaries of the teachers, and there we shall be stopped. For these reasons I think the Government ought to give us an opportunity early next session of discussing both the intermediate system and these revolutionary changes. I think we are entitled to make that demand. We have been cut down to three days for Irish Estimates, and it may be next July before they will be reached, and the new system will then be in operation for more than a year. I would respectfully urge the Government that we should be afforded an opportunity for discussing these matters early next session.

MR. LECKY: I think it would be much better to postpone this measure to another session. There is a great deal of difference of opinion on the subject. I myself am not prepared to endorse altogether the views of the Chief Secretary, and I think that under the circumstances it would be very much better if the Bill were not pressed forward.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: After the views which have been expressed on both sides it must be clear that the best course would be to withdraw the Bill and bring it in later, when the operations of the new rules will be better known.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give some answer as regards facilities for discussing this matter next session.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is impossible for me to answer that question. I recognise the extreme importance of the changes we are about to introduce into both the intermediate and elementary systems of education, and, personally, I should not be adverse to a day being given for a discussion of the whole question, but of course it must be clearly understood that I am not in a position to give any undertaking on that point without consulting my colleagues. I beg to

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question put
"That the Bill be now read in time."

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeen E.): Before we pass the Third of this Bill I should like to make observations regarding it. It has to pass through another place, and Amendments may be made in it at any rate will not be to the interests of the landlord taking the Bill as we find it. I should like to say a few words. First of all, how far does this remedy the acknowledged grievances of agricultural tenants in England and Wales, and how far is it a proportion of the many promises given by the Government and the Government at the last General Election. Other times with regard to this. To deal with the second question I think I am within the mark in saying that the passage of this Bill is a deferred and very inadequate fulfilment of the promises and pledges given by the Government and the Government opposite on this subject. I have the recollection of hon. Members in the last Parliament that on this subject more frequently brought forward by the Conservative Opposition the interests of agriculture and the interests of agricultural tenants. In the last Parliament an Amendment to the Address was moved by a member of the Conservative Party, not content with that, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Essex moved the adjournment of the House on this subject. Amendments were supported by hon. members then on the Front Bench, and no one was more

That does not look as if the supporters of the Bill attached supreme importance to it, or as if they believed that it in any sense provides an adequate remedy for the grievances of the agricultural tenants. It has been stated more than once by the President of the Board of Agriculture that, after all, this Bill will only deal with 5 per cent. of the cases of compensation that arise. I do not think a Bill is of much importance which only deals with one in forty of the grievances of agricultural tenants. It was described on the Second Reading by the hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Hampshire, a strong supporter of the Government, as "a small amending Bill"; and another hon. Gentleman opposite described it as "as good a Bill as could be got under the circumstances"; while the other night a no less strong supporter of the Government said of it that "if not totally unnecessary it was certainly harmless." Now, these are not descriptions by hon. Members on this side of the House, but by either the authors of the Bill or the most strenuous supporters of the Government and their policy. Does the Bill really make any serious attempt to settle the grievances that have existed among the agricultural tenants? It will be in the memory of all that the President of the Board of Agriculture, when introducing the Bill, and before we had seen it, described it as a Bill that would settle once for all the differences between the owners and occupiers of land. When we had the opportunity of examining and discussing it in detail, we saw how very wide of the mark indeed and exaggerated that description was. I want to state to the House what were the general proposals for the amendment of the Agricultural Holdings Act which were put forward by leading agriculturists, and what are the actual proposals in the Bill. I have here one of the most valuable Reports made by the sub-commissioners. Mr. James Hope, a supporter of the Government, dealing with various counties in Scotland, summarises the principal Amendments on which he said opinion was unanimous which should be made in the Agricultural Holdings Act.

It will be found that, at the outside, not more than two or three of these Amendments have been inserted in this Bill. But if hon. Gentlemen care to take a more simple method of testing the value of the Bill, they have only got to compare the schedules in the Bill with the schedules in the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883. They will see that the alterations are very infinitesimal, and substantially, so far as that part of the Bill is concerned, it deals very inadequately with large and important grievances undoubtedly felt by the agricultural community throughout the country. One of the recommendations held out to us in regard to the Bill was that it would very largely simplify and cheapen procedure under the Agricultural Holdings Act, and it was said: "Here, at any rate, you will have your cases decided by a single arbitrator, and no longer by two arbitrators and an umpire, which has caused so much expense in the old procedure." When, in Committee, I endeavoured to have the Bill amended so that the procedure should really be by a single arbitrator, I was told by the Attorney General that my proposal was far too drastic, and that we ought not to make a single arbitrator compulsory. I have never got any explanation from the Attorney General or the President of the Board of Agriculture as to how the procedure under this Bill is to be cheaper and simpler than under the existing Act. The actual proposals in the Bill are very inadequate to deal with existing grievances. It is, in fact, a very incomplete and insufficient measure. I venture to say that it does not deal with the grievances of large classes of tenants; and however applicable it may be to some classes of tenants in England, it is entirely inadequate to deal with the grievances of agriculturists in Scotland, while it is singularly inapplicable to the agricultural conditions of Wales, as will be shown by-and-by by Members from Wales. Meantime I will only deal with it as it affects my own country. When the Bill was considered on the Report stage I was constantly told by the President of the Board of Agriculture, in answer to my complaints, "Oh! that is only the case of Scotland. I cannot profess to know the actual conditions of Scotland." That was considered a sufficient answer to the arguments which my colleagues and I brought forward to show that the Bill would not adequately meet the demand of Scottish tenants. I have often heard before that "There are no hills beyond Pentland, and lands beyond Forth," but we would have been content to cut out from this Bill the hills beyond Pentland and the lands beyond Forth. What we complained of was that you have endeavoured to make one common Bill for England and Wales and land subjects which have hitherto been invariably treated by separate Acts in order to meet the separate demands and separate conditions of agriculture in each country. The hon. Member for King's Lynn talked about legislation by referendum. I do not know any Scottish agriculturist and not many Scottish lawyers, but I would be able to understand this Bill at first sight. But our substantial grievance is that you are endeavouring to deal with agricultural questions, but with questions affecting the tenure of land, which are entirely different in Scotland and England and Wales. More than that, we pointed out, and nobody knows this better than the Attorney General—that there were large classes of tenants, particularly in the north-east of Scotland, who would be absolutely excluded by the terms of the schedule from getting any compensation for the substantial improvements they had made on their holdings. Then we pointed out the small improving tenants and squatters. Now the First Lord of the Treasury, in the summer of 1895, speaking about what he considered to be the obligations of his party to bring forward an adequate measure of compensation, gave a very specific promise that any such measure would be applicable to small as well as large tenants in all three countries. It would affect, he said, small men as well as big men. The Government have continuously failed to bring forward a measure that is able to satisfy the demands of these small tenants for whom the First Lord of the Treasury pleaded in 1895, and they will for another term of years be shut out from obtaining any measure of relief. It is on these grounds—the conspicuous failure to redeem the repeated and most specific pledges given by responsible Members of the Government; of the valuelessness of the Bill to give to industrious and enterprising tenants the assurance of compensation they put their capital into the soil, because it will delay remedial legislation.

any Amendment, and not to speak often, but of course that does not mean that I thought the Bill absolutely perfect. I could have made some suggestions to the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the Bill which it might have been well to have carried out. I think a man should be allowed to cultivate the soil as he likes, so long as its fertility is not impaired; that there should be no penal rents unless actual damage is proved;
and that there should be compensation for continuous good farming. I congratulate the Government on having had the courage to resist certain Amendments made by some of their own supporters, especially that proposed by the hon. Member for Newark, which alluded to the inherent capabilities of the soil. The Government very properly resisted that Amendment.
If they had not done so they would have made the Bill ridiculous, and would have caused great dissatisfaction in the eastern counties, which I know well. If the inherent capabilities of the soil are high a man pays a high rent, if they are low he pays a low rent, and therefore, practically, there is nothing in it. I hope that in a future Parliament the right hon.
Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture will, from this side of the Table or the other, introduce a Bill to carry out the suggestions I have made. For the rest I can only say I am extremely glad that the Government have brought in this Bill. I do not say that it will be accepted with effusive gratitude, because effusive gratitude is proverbially not a quality of the agricultural interest; but I know it is a good step in the right direction.

*MR. LAMBERT (Devonshire, South Molton): I regret the absence of the Minister for Agriculture, who, I believe, is too ill to conduct this Bill through its last stage in this House. We will miss the right hon. Gentleman, for he is a master of the subject. If I may be pardoned by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, I think that if, instead of going into ancient history and what had been done in the last Parliament, he had read the Bill more carefully his speech would have been more valuable. He stated that the law of distraint for rent had been practically abolished. Why, it is not in the Bill. When an Amendment was moved to abolish distraint I am rather afraid that it did not receive the support of the hon. Gentleman. I cannot but express the disappointment which I feel, and which has been voiced in the country, that this Bill is not more complete and effective. There is not the slightest doubt that the farming interest expected a Bill which would give them larger rights to compensation at the end of a tenancy. It makes confusion worse confounded; for any farmer who wants to know his rights under the Bill, must provide himself with a small arsenal of Acts of Parliament. We know that farmers do not, and will not provide themselves with all these Acts of Parliament; and instead of being able to know exactly how they stand, they will have to go to expert valuers, and pay them for information, which ought to have been made clear in the Act itself. A second complaint which I have to make is that the Bill does not sufficiently strengthen the agricultural tenant. I may congratulate the Agricultural Department on having exercised considerable ingenuity in drawing up a Bill of fourteen clauses, which practically does so very little. It is a Bill fairly pretentious in size, but what it does is almost absolutely nil. A change of front always takes place by hon. Gentlemen opposite, according to whether they are in or out of office. I noticed the Minister of Agriculture, speaking at a rent-audit of the Duke of Portland, said that the less legislation there was for agriculturists the better it would be for them. That was not the cry we heard at the last General Election. I think, however, he has impressed his views on this Bill, because it does so very little for agriculturists. There are two good things in the Bill. It gives the farmer compensation for laying down permanent pasture; and the arbitration clauses are good. But, unfortunately, these arbitration clauses are vitiated by the poison which runs through the whole Bill—the power to the landlord to contract himself out of the measure. We know perfectly well that the Act of 1875 was passed to abolish contracting-out clauses, and to enable every landlord sent down to his tenants, saying he would do as he pleased under the Act. I do not want to least to discourage agreements between landlord and tenant. The agreements are fair to the tenant. What we want is that we shall have an Act of Parliament upon which the tenant can fall back when he has no fair agreement. That is what we get in this Bill. The arbitration clauses are very good indeed, but are vitiated by the fact that the landlord can contract himself out of them. I cannot understand that a landlord does not like to have to pay compensation at the end of a tenancy, and I know this, that the result of this contracting out will be that the tenants will be deterred from making claims in; because if they go to arbitration and there is an appeal it will be up the costs, and that is a matter which affects the farmer more than the landlord because the landlord has the longest purse. We are told that the tenant farmer will not sign agreements that are not to his advantage; the only answer to that is that they do. It has been brought out before the Royal Commission that the tenant farmer has been publicly exposed in this way over and over again, that tenants are made to sign impossible agreements in order to get into a farm. The object of this is to protect the farmers from unfair agreements, and if it is not able to protect themselves the reason for this Bill. But the Government recognises that the tenant farmer cannot protect themselves, and then introduced this Bill for their protection. I shall be told, I suppose, that farmers running after the landlords who run after the tenants. That may be so in some cases, so in the west of England, and in fact that there are six or eight farms after a farm compels the tenant to sign an agreement which is prejudicial to himself in order to get into the farm. We want is that the tenant farmer should have compensation when they have holdings for improvements made. There is the question of permanent pasture. I never c

I am not, of course, f honourable landlords—this intended for good landlords, e who treat their tenants un- e claim for compensation by is to be lodged before the determination of the tenancy, but if the landlord has a claim for dilapidations, he need not claim for six years after the determination of the tenancy. That is a constant source of complaint, and the witnesses before the Royal Commission were almost unanimous in advocating that the claims both of the landlord and the tenant, should be put in on the same day. Under the Agricultural Act of 1883 the landlord is allowed to see the tenant's claim before putting in his own, with the consequence that very often exaggerated claims on the part of the landlord are put in. Upon this point I would like to quote some evidence given in favour of the claims of the landlord and tenant being delivered simultaneously. Mr. Clare Sewell Read, whose authority to speak upon this point no one will challenge, says—

“Where the tenant has made a claim the landlord has made a bigger counterclaim. This in consequence of the landlord having time to consider the tenant's claim. I am sure it would be diminished by the claims being made simultaneously.”

And Mr. Lipscombe, the Chairman of the Committee of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, which was appointed to draw up a new Agricultural Bill, says that that was a universal complaint, and that the Committee appointed to examine into the question was almost unanimous in recommending that the two claims should be put in on the same day. We ask the Government to accept that. In Grand Committee it was proposed by the hon. Member for North Hampshire, and we want to know whose views the Govern- ment propose to carry out in this matter. Do they propose to carry out the views of the tenant farmer or of people who have no interest in, and less knowledge of, the matter? It is a matter upon which the tenant farmers feel very strongly indeed. There seems to be an alarming dread in this House of giving powers to strengthen the position of the tenant farmer. It was only the other day that we had a revolt from below the gangway, because the Government proposed to allow the tenant to plant an acre of osiers without the consent of the landlord. Then certain noble supporters of the Government woke up to the fact that that was an infringement of the freedom of contract between landlord and tenant. We have been interfering with freedom of contract all through this Parliament; we did so when we passed an Act for compensation for injuries for the labourer, and why should not the landlord be bound to pay compensation for improvements made by the tenant? It seems to me that when they come to deal with the landlords the Government have a special tenderness for their supporters. This is a matter of extreme importance to farmers. I have had cases come before me of men who had been farming for a number of years, and by skill and experience and good husbandry they have greatly improved the land; yet when they leave, all the improvement goes into the pocket of the landlord. Why should that be? Those facts cannot be disputed. I can bring cases where that has occurred, and where that has taken place this Bill will do nothing to protect the man who has laid out his money in this respect, and ensure compensation for good farming and increasing the value of the holding for the incoming tenant. We do not ask that the tenant should be paid for work which does not add to the value of the land; but if improvements have added to the value of the holding, then he ought to be compensated. I regret that the Government have not accepted many of the Amendments which were proposed to make the Bill more effective and simple; but although the Bill is ineffective and complicated, it does some little good. [Ministerial cheers.] Yes, but it cannot be said to give us even half a loaf. It gives us a crumb of bread, and that being so, I cannot support my friend in voting against the Third Reading; though, at the same time, I cannot congratulate the Government upon the measure which they have brought in.

MR. STRUTT (Essex, Maldon): There is one blemish in the Bill which I think the Government might rectify very well—that is its incomprehensibility. It is almost impossible for any ordinary layman from reading this Bill by itself to understand in any way what the law is. The people whose interests are affected by this Bill are not lawyers, and I think if the Government would give us a promise to bring in a Bill to codify these matters dealing with tenant right they would confer a great boon on the tenant-farmer class. They could easily bring in a Bill to join all these matters together in one simple measure which would be understood, and which would be added to any other measure, but would not take itself everything necessary to enable the farmer or landlord to understand the law is. The Bill as it stands carries a terrible blemish of making it impossible for a tenant farmer when he comes to find out what the law is to go to a lawyer. I hope, therefore, the Government will give us a promise that they intend in a future session as early a session as possible to bring in a Bill to codify the law relating to these important questions of tenant right.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Gloucestershire, E.) said that, in intervening in the present debate he wished it to be understood that it was not done for the purpose of wrecking the Bill, for as it goes the measure pointed in the right direction. Still less was it intended as a way of a complaint against the right Gentleman in charge of the Bill, in which we recognised not only an able administrator but one also who, we believe, sympathises very deeply with the difficult and arduous position of the tenant. Our object in intervening in the present debate is to emphasise our feeling of disappointment that the Government in drafting the Bill, totally ignoring the recommendations of the unanimous report of the Welsh Land Commission, the treatment offered by the Government to other Reports of two different Commissions, perhaps we were sanguine to expect to be disappointed differently, and though he could often commend them on the consistency, he could with much propriety with regard to their equality of treatment of the two Royal Commissions appointed by themselves as well as of the one appointed by Mr. Gladstone. But, Sir, something should be said for the unfortunate individual who sits on the Royal Commissions. Take the case of the one who sat on the Welsh Land Commission. The Commission commenced its labours in April, 1893, and ended in December, 1895, some two years and nine months. They held about 15 meetings, and examined many hundreds of witnesses, and wrote out two enormous and exhaustive Reports. What was the result? To be simply what self-respecting man would sit on a Royal Commission giving some three years of his (or otherwise) time to the public, hours should be treated with so contempt as to be beneath the of the Government? But, Sir, if Government think so little or nothing recommendations of three such distinguished men as Lord Kenyon, the hon. Member for Swansea, and Frederic Seebohm, the people of think very highly of them. The former as representing the best type landlord in the Principality and the as undoubtedly the greatest authority on land tenure in the United Kingdom, perhaps in the world. It is to be expected that the name of Mr. Seebohm is a household word among the of the tenant farmers of Wales, though his face must be familiar to many of them—those who appeared before the Commission, which held meetings in every important centre in the Principality. And not a few, he had no doubt, had read some of the many works he had written, especially one dealing with the Principality—"The Tribal System in Wales." But the other two gentlemen are well known, Lord Kenyon in the north and the hon. Baronet in the south, and both highly esteemed and respected, and all three ardent supporters of the present Government. In reading the Report signed by those three gentlemen one is reminded of a long chapter in the Book of Lamentations. Undoubtedly they felt they held a very undignified position that they should simply represent three fingerposts pointing to the direction their bolder and more enterprising colleagues had travelled and left them out of sight. Especially so must it have been to the author of the "Land Question." Though he said that those gentlemen had only pointed the way that should be traversed, at the same time, in justice to them, it should be stated that they only differed in degree and not in principle from their colleagues. It is true they used other terms.

"What's in a name? that which we call a rose
By any other name would smell as sweet."

Now, Sir, let us examine some two or three of the recommendations of those gentlemen. In their Report they seem much concerned that they should not be understood as advocating what is known as "Fixity of Tenure." Yet in dealing with the question of "Notice to Quit" they say—

"We are also of opinion that whenever a notice to quit is given it should state the reason why it is given, and that whenever the reason is other than a breach of the legal conditions of tenancy it would be fair that, in recognition of the cost to the tenant of an enforced change of tenancy, a longer notice should be required than in a case where the tenant is in default, or else that in such a case the rent should be made to cease in respect of the last year of the tenancy."

Then they say that in case of a tenant who has performed all conditions under which he holds his tenancy he should be compensated for disturbance. They say that the rent of the last year of his tenancy should be forfeited. A very moderate proposal, but it has in it more than the germ of the principle of fixity. No doubt bolder reformers would say five or seven years. It is only a question of degree, and not of principle. Again, in the case of the "Sale of an Estate," they say—

"On the whole, in a case in which it is necessary to choose between the interest of the selling landlord, who naturally desires to obtain the highest price attainable for his property, and the interest of often a considerable number of tenants to whom it is more or less a question financially of life or death, we are disposed to think the law ought to lean on the side of the weaker party. And we are disposed to suggest that the equity of the case would be more than reasonably met by the provision that in case of the death of an estate owner or the sale of the estate the tenant shall be protected by law in the occupation of his farm at the old rent for say three years from the date of death or sale, except in case of non-payment of rent or the infringement of the conditions of the tenancy, which under the circumstances of the case should be stringent enough to protect the landlord from the depreciation or exhaustion of the farm."

Here again, in their meek and mild way, they are advocating the principle of fixity of tenure, and in doing so they deserve every encouragement, as they are on the right line. For it is only by securing to the tenant who faithfully performs the conditions of his tenancy practically fixity of tenure, can we ever hope to see a satisfactory settlement of the "Land Question." Another bogey that frightened our three friends was the proposal of the majority of the Commissioners to set up a Land Court. To this, among other things, they say—

"We would suggest that if on an estate there should be what may roughly be described as a general dispute between landlords and tenants tending to disturbance or public scandal or manifest injustice, both the landlord on the one hand and a certain portion of the tenants on the other hand, under proper restrictions and upon an engagement to pay a certain maximum fee, should have the right to call in to their aid an expert from the Board of Agriculture or some other recognised authority to act as mediator, with a view, if possible, to bring about a friendly settlement."

Again, they advocate a new principle in the relation of landlord and tenant, and while they view with horror a properly constituted land court, yet they suggest the appointment of a go-between to settle disputes between landlords and tenants, who is to be awarded a maximum fee. While fully realising that we could not hope to settle so old and great a question as that of the relationship of landlord and tenant by the very mild proposals of those three gentlemen, we at the same time admit that there is some ground for the statement they make on the last paragraph of their Report—

"It is believed that were the law regarding year-to-year tenancy amended as we ventured to suggest a great step would be gained towards the removal of the feeling of insecurity and of other causes of dissatisfaction between landlords and tenants, without unduly infringing upon the principle of freedom of contract and without destroying the great advantages which, on the whole, and in spite of defects, the present agricultural system affords to the various classes of the Welsh people whose living is connected with the land."

Their words prove that they had properly estimated the gravity of the situation when they said—

"A great step would be gained towards the removal of the feeling of dissatisfaction between landlords and tenants."

Still they say it was only a step—though a great step. That is an admission that what they proposed was not sufficient, and could not settle the question. Though they only proposed a step in the direction of the solution of this great question, it was more than the Government would take in the interests of the Welsh tenant farmers. There is no class in the community so helpless and defenceless as the tenant farmer. Even the agricultural labourer has his association to defend him. But the poor tenant farmer is left unprotected to any and every oppression. While we know and rejoice in the fact that there are landlords who treat their tenants as well as ever they would be treated under any legislation, we know they are but comparatively few. What we want is to bring the other landlords to their level, and no Government neglects the rights of the tenant can be said to be doing its duty. The State in leaving the most important question in the community without any legislation.

*MR. GILES (Cambridge): I should like to call attention to the fact that whatever the Bill does is in the interest of the tenant farmer, and that it does nothing to the disadvantage of the landlord with the exception of a small advantage in Clause 5. With regard to the criticism that this is a Consolidation Bill, and that it would be a very great advantage to tenant farmers to have a Consolidation Bill, all I have to say is that no doubt Consolidation Bills are extremely convenient to lawyers and those who, having no knowledge of the subject, desire to study it. But farmers, of whom I have heard much, undoubtedly have some knowledge of the subject, and they do not rely for their knowledge on the Agricultural Holdings Act Bill, whether Consolidation or not. They invariably go to some text book for an explanation of the various provisions. I do not desire to say anything against Consolidation Acts, but it is a criticism upon this Bill, which is a satisfactory measure, to say that it does not to the full extent a Consolidation Bill. The hon. Member for Southampton found fault with the Government for passing a simple Bill giving the tenant independent of contract. I point out in the interests of the tenant, especially small farmers, that on the other side to that question give an illustration, some of which came under my personal observation in the case of a farmer, a self-sufficient farmer, and without capital. He had the experience of farming, and when the rent he was forced to pay was too much for him he went to another part of the county and took another farm. He was enabled to take that farm on his reputation as a farmer, and without this sort of consideration. The hon. Member said: "If you will take this farm on a rental and require no compensation when you leave, the rent will be low." I should like to say to the hon. Member that if you will take this farm on a rental and require no compensation when you leave, the rent will be low.

Mr. Alfred Thomas.

acre; but if you require compensation I must forestall that possibility by saying you so much more per acre." These circumstances a contract was—in my opinion very much to the advantage of the tenant farmer, who, being a tenant without capital, was thus enabled to work his farm and work it to the satisfaction of the landlord, and by means of the Bill which he made he had to pay a moderate rent—a rent very much less than that which he would have had to pay had he insisted on all the terms of the Agricultural Holdings Act. There is another point. I contend that this Bill, if it contained no other provision than the Arbitration Clause, would be of great advantage to the agricultural industry. For years there has been a great want for a clause of this kind to regulate the relations between tenant farmers and landlords. Up to the present time if a tenant farmer desired to get justice from his landlord he had to begin by making a statement of claim, which in certain circumstances involved summonses for particulars and summonses for particulars; these summonses in Chambers would, perhaps, require two or three attendances before the judge, and possibly an appeal. That would be followed by a statement of defence, and a reply. In a particular case I have in mind the case was followed by a notice of trial; the trial actually took place before a special jury at the assizes, and certain gentlemen were specially taken down to attend. The trial had not gone on very long before it was referred, and the reference took place. Each side appointed an arbitrator, and the two arbitrators appointed an umpire, and a considerable number of days were occupied in taking evidence on each side. Those who know anything about these proceedings know that the expenses incurred before getting to arbitration were very serious indeed. Now, I am glad to say, although it is much against the interest of the profession of which I am a humble member, the tenant farmers can obtain justice and get their claims satisfied without any of that very heavy preliminary expense. There is one other point in regard to the clause to which I should like to call attention. Fault was found with it because of the costs involved. But by the terms of Clause 14, which deals with costs, those costs are in the discretion of the arbitrator, and if the arbitrator finds that the tenant farmer has a fair claim to compensation which has not been fairly met by the landlord it will be undoubtedly his duty to award costs against the landlord, and in that case the tenant would be relieved of the costs, or the greater part of them. I am sure a great number of tenant farmers would welcome this Bill with satisfaction and gratitude.

*MR. BRYNMOR JONES (Swansea District): I think the hon. and learned Member for the Wisbech Division speaks with considerable authority when he says this Bill will be welcomed by many tenant farmers, but it will be welcomed only in English counties, not in Wales. It is a Bill which wholly fails to satisfy the pledges given by hon. Members opposite, and candidates who stood in the Unionist interest at the election of 1895 in the thirteen counties of Wales and Monmouthshire. I do not wish to delay the passing of this Bill into law. For what it is we are willing to accept it, and, for myself, I am not going to vote against it. But I think that we who represent Welsh constituencies have been a great deal too forbearing in regard to the conduct of Welsh agricultural matters by the present Government. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture is not in his place to-night. I regret the cause of his absence, and I join in the tribute paid by the hon. Member for East Glamorganshire to the courtesy with which he has invariably treated us in regard to matters concerning the Department over which he presides. But the position in Wales with regard to this Agricultural Holdings Bill is entirely special. The right hon. Gentleman himself, in the debate on the Second Reading of this Bill, practically admitted that the case for Wales was distinct from the case for England or Scotland. Let me briefly recall the recent history of this land question in Wales, and the demands made by Welsh tenant farmers—demands which I understand the right hon. Gentleman and the Government say are sufficiently met by the Bill now before the House. As far back as 1843 and 1844 there were strong demands made for a reform of agricultural tenancies in Wales and Monmouthshire, especially in those parts of Wales in which the prevailing language was the Welsh language. From 1839 to 1843 there were serious dis turbances in Wales, which came to be known as the "Rebecca Riots," and which were due to agrarian causes. From the time when these riots broke out down to the present there has been a persistent movement in favour of altering the law relating to landlord and tenant. It is not so much the question whether the mere formal legal tenure is satisfactory that agitates the minds of the tenant farmers; it is the economic question of how the system is carried out. Down to about the end of the last century there was very little trouble in Wales. But about the beginning of the century, and especially after the close of the Great War, a new system was introduced, under which the landlord undertook practically to make all the improvements on agricultural holdings. That was the theory and the understanding, but the system has broken down in certain parts of the country, though not everywhere; for the tenant in many cases has to supply labour, and also do the haulage of materials—a very costly item in a mountainous country. On the whole the result was to produce a state of profound dissatisfaction among Welsh tenant farmers, and the state of dissatisfaction has continued down to the present time. When the agricultural industry, as a whole, is making better profits you naturally do not hear so many complaints, and there was a time when the Welsh complaints sank down because agricultural prices were so high; but the Welsh tenant farmers have never lost sight of the grievances which, having regard to the special circumstances of the Principality, are necessarily inflicted upon them. Many complaints were made in the Welsh newspapers, and, as a result, in 1892 the Welsh landlords asked the then Conservative Government to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the alleged grievances of the tenant farmers of Wales. The Government refused. In the middle of 1892 there was a change of Government; the demands for a Royal Commission were renewed from many quarters, and ultimately, in March, 1893, Mr. Gladstone appointed a Royal Commission with a designedly broad reference to consider all the questions connected with the holding, occupation, and cultivation of land in Wales. That Commission, like most Commissions, was not absolutely equal in its party complexion, but at any rate there were upon it three gentlemen representing the party opposite—namely, Lord Kemp, a colleague in the representative of the sea, and Mr. Frederic Seebohm, who were also Principal Rhys, a man who had taken no overt part in politics. As tenant farmers, the chairman of the Monmouthshire County Council, and others. We did our best to inquire into the matters referred to us, and it has been entirely overlooked by our critics that the statement of facts in the Report is a statement of the condition of things in the Principality has never been challenged by any one. Nearly the whole of the Report is confirmed by all the Commissioners, and is a statement of facts connected with the Principality. Some may say that the number of our facts were small, but ["Hear, hear!"] An hon. Member said, "Hear, hear!" What facts are irrelevant to a broad consideration of the subject? Does he contend that the history of the country has no relation to the question with which this Bill is concerned? If so, that is a very narrow point of view to take. If you say that my first principle that we are agreed to have absolutely the same law for the whole of the United Kingdom," the particular facts connected with the history of a particular county or collection of counties are, of course, irrelevant. But the adoption of such a principle is not statesmanship? Not at all. The hon. Gentlemen like my friend Lord Kemp have failed to grasp the true meaning of our notion of what a Report is. It is a statement of what is in Wales and Monmouthshire, and what the legislation in regard to land in Wales ought to be. But we have pursued that topic, as I was saying, to something which is absolutely irrelevant to this Bill. Having given the best consideration to the subject, we have arrived at a series of conclusions which are absolutely clear, very important, and ought to carry weight with the Government and with the country. The first things we agreed upon were

"We have no right to pronounce on the question whether such an amendment to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883

That refers to certain much more important amendments of the Act of 1883 contained in the present Bill.

"—and of the law of landlord and tenant as to agricultural holdings in England as well as for Wales; and of the prejudice to this question we think is disclosed in regard to the circumstances disclosed in regard

...very urgently call for legislation such as above sketched, and that it would be to deal with the case of Wales in a Bill for this purpose, however desirable may be as a general rule to avoid or particular legislation."

...the attention of the Attorney to that sentence in the Report. ...signed by supporters of the present Government. But I do not want to make much of that point, because there is nothing more important than that. Lord ... is one of the most popular and landlords in Wales; so also is my hon. the Member for Swansea Town. ... are both large landowners; men are to become tenants on their estates. ... paragraph was signed by them, ... their whole spirit, in a sense, ... against the idea of any recognition ... as a separate nation. Nor, ... do I claim that sentence as necess- ... involving any theory of a separate ... onality. The point I put as a practi- ... point for the consideration of the ... Government is that there are many ... matters within the sphere of jurisprudence ... which may well be treated separately. I ... that in regard to the marriage laws, ... of exchange, mercantile documents, ... so on, it would be very inconvenient ... and inexpedient to have separate legisla- ... for different parts of the United ... Kingdom. But when you come to ... matters relating to land the question is ... quite different. It is right and proper, if ... you want to have a good economic ... system for the whole of the Kingdom, ... that the particular circumstances of ... counties, districts, or provinces should be ... taken into account by the legislature in ... dealing with these matters. Our first ... complaint against the Government, there- ... fore, is that we are not given a separate ... Bill. We demand that Bill; we say that ... you have directly or indirectly promised ... us that Bill; friends of yours sat upon ... the Commission; they have assented to ... it; they applied their minds to the ques- ... tion; they did their work honestly; that ... is the conclusion at which they arrived. I ... am not going into minute details, as we are ... all practically agreed that this Bill should ... become law. But let me point out what ... were the conclusions at which that Com- ... mission unanimously arrived. They ... agreed that, having regard to what took ... place in 1868 and years afterwards— ... although they would not admit that the ... tenure from year to year was necessarily a bad kind of tenure for agricultural pur- ... poses—the unlimited right of the landlord, ... without any cause shown, to give notice to ... quit to the tenant ought not to be further ... maintained. Accordingly, one of their ... unanimous recommendations is that in ... case a landlord gives notice to quit to a ... tenant without reasonable cause, and if ... the tenant has paid his rent and has not ... been guilty of any breach of the covenants ... or the conditions in the agreement, there ... should be, in the discretion of the arbi- ... trator, an amount allowed as compensation ... for capricious disturbance. That is not ... in this Bill. If you want to make the ... relations between landlord and tenant ... fair, the special circumstances of Wales ... demand the insertion of such a clause. ... We have made no general charge against ... the landlords of Wales, but at the same ... time, especially in regard to the smaller ... estates, there are evictions from time to ... time for which no reason satisfactory to ... the district in which the event takes place ... can be given. The result is very dis- ... advantageous from many points of view. ... It disturbs other farmers on the estate; ... it disturbs the whole parish; it gives rise ... to all sorts of suspicious feelings on the ... part of the tenant farmers. In any case, ... evictions without cause are not fair in a ... country with the historic circumstances ... of Wales, where in many cases the ... families of the present tenant farmers ... have been on the same holdings for hun- ... dreds of years. I need hardly point out ... that it was proved, not only before ... our own Commission, but also before ... the Agricultural Commission for Eng- ... land, that to make a man move from one ... farm to another was practically tanta- ... mount to fining him 20 per cent. on the ... whole capital invested in the farm. I ... beg in all seriousness, and without any ... polemical intent, the Government to take ... notice of a significant fact like that, and that ... men like Lord Kenyon, and practically ... all the best agents in Wales, are quite ... willing to assent to a clause pro- ... viding for compensation for capricious ... disturbance. The majority of the ... Commission adopted the theory of a land ... court, not at all in the sense of the Irish ... Act of 1881, nor did our proposed legisla- ... tion create a dual ownership. On that I ... say nothing. We cannot expect this ... Government to do anything of that kind, ... and therefore I will not say anything in ... support of the general plan of the majority ... of the Commission. But there was another practical point suggested by all the Commissioners. It was to prevent the injustice which in practice arises from the fact that the rent is often raised upon the improvements of the sitting tenant. The matter is not quite easy to explain, and perhaps the law itself is not entirely to blame, but that the injustice does take place is admitted by the three Commissioners I have named. It happens in this way. I will take one kind of case only. Supposing there is a large estate going to be sold. The first thing that occurs is, seeing that the purchaser will have the right to demand possession, notice to quit is given to all the tenants. When the 29th September, the usual date for the expiry of the notice, approaches, no Welsh tenant dares give what he has a right to give to his landlord or the persons acting for the landlord, namely, the two months' notice under the Act of 1883 for compensation. If he did that it would be accepted, and he would have to leave on the 29th September, for the simple reason that, owing to the special circumstances of Wales, there are so many demands for these holdings; there is such a great land hunger that the man knows very well that his landlord will let him go, and that he may get something for his improvements under the Act of 1883, but to leave his farm is the very last thing he desires. It is not merely a matter of money with him, for he wants to bring up his family on the holding which from generation to generation his ancestors have occupied. After the sale has taken place and the new purchaser comes upon the scene a revaluation takes place, and the new holder naturally proceeds upon the basis of what the landlord thinks the farm is worth, with the result that rents are raised all round. I do not want to develop these points in detail, but I think I have made the meaning of this unanimous report clear. I wish to call the attention of the Attorney General to the fact that two of the greatest Welsh landlords agreed to this policy. Further we are face to face with cases where estates are heavily mortgaged and in Chancery, and in which trustees for the real owners were in possession. Here exists a state of things under which, if you do this or that, you may be running a risk of pecuniary loss. This Commission unanimously recommended that there should be a court, but a kind of public arbitration, that there should be an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Agriculture to hear the estates in that situation. If the tenant complained and the trustee gave an answer, "I dare not comply with your request because I cannot tell what the Chancery judges may do," in such a case a suggestion made by the Commissioners was that the Board of Agriculture should appoint arbitrators or arbitrators to hear both the trustees and the mortgagees and the tenants complain. They shall say what in their judgment is to be done, and the decision of the arbitrators shall be binding upon the trustee in Chancery. I have only taken three points of a definite and practical character in order to show how it is to Wales for the Government to bring in a Bill of this kind as a satisfaction of the claims of the Welsh tenants. This Commission arrived at a definite conclusion about the facts of its Report has been given the Government no doubt the Government at the next election will claim that they have passed an Agricultural Holdings Act of a highly beneficial character. But that will not go down in Wales. On the Second Reading I put these points before the House and the Government did not attend to them. We are not wild revolutionaries, and we are not asking for the breaking up of great estates. The Commission recommended that the best system was one of large estates; but what object to is allowing a system to go which is inevitably thrusting out the Welshman after Welshman. These farms are the nursery of a very sturdy vigorous race, and we want to keep people upon the land where they lived from generation to generation. We have no desire to introduce any ill-feeling between landlord and tenant, but of course you are taking in neglect. The Report of this Commission is one which will be fraught with disaster to the country. We know that the best way for a nation can have is a good set of capable citizens, and you cannot do that better than by keeping the Welsh families on their land. You cannot accomplish that by little by little, and you can only do it by a broad and statesmanlike view of the situation.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I think the whole of this question rests upon the issue as to whether the conditions in Wales are essentially different from those which exist in England in regard to the claim for land legislation. What I venture to affirm is, that if anyone will take the trouble to inquire into the facts as they really exist in Wales he is bound to come to the conclusion that there is a real difference between the position of the two countries in this respect. In proof of this statement, I need only say that the Welsh Land Commission, after an exhaustive inquiry, came unanimously to that conclusion. The House already knows this from the conclusive arguments used by my hon. friend below me, but I would lay special stress upon their unanimity in regard to some of the most important points we have to consider. I am not going to recapitulate what has already been said in reference to the character of the Welsh Land Commission; neither am I going to describe in detail the important recommendations which they made. I should like to point out, however, that the case of Wales is substantially different in regard to its agriculture to that of England, and our claim to separate legislation in regard to land reform rests broadly upon a different historical development. Anybody who has any knowledge of Welsh life must at once see the differences in race, in language, habits, and customs which so largely prevail between the two countries, and these must have their effect upon the agricultural environments of the two countries. Anybody who has paid the slightest notice to the course of recent events in Wales must have been struck by the very rapid advance made in public opinion in recent years upon this question.
So far as the knowledge of the facts of this House and the country generally goes, the development has been more or less recent, because it is a fact that during recent years Wales has had a chance of expressing politically its mind upon these public questions. I would simply remind the House of one or two simple facts showing the depth and reality of the position of Wales in regard to the question of land reform. The House will remember what took place in 1886, and upon the introduction of the Welsh Land Bill of 1891. I need not remind the House of the appointment of the Commission of 1893 which reported in 1896. But there are one or two practical facts that I should like to mention very briefly to the House, which prove the case which I am endeavouring to make. What are one or two of the practical differences in regard to Welsh and English agricultural life? First of all, there is this fact, that in Wales to-day there are fewer occupying freeholders than in England. In England they number 15 per cent. of the whole, but in Wales the occupying freeholders only number 12 per cent. of the whole. In the county of Denbigh the proportion is only 10 per cent. Therefore there exists friction between landlord and tenant in a very acute form. It is almost inevitable that there should be a more acute land-hunger prevailing in Wales than in England, when there is a clear line of cleavage between the general body of landowners and the tenants on great questions of political opinions and of religious creeds. In Wales the farms are smaller than in England; there are more applicants for them, and the country is poorer. If any hon. Member chooses to look closely into this matter he will find abundant proof of what I am saying. In Wales you will find patches on the mountain side which have been cultivated, and I venture to say it would be impossible to find such patches in England. That seems to me to prove fully that there are certain fundamental differences between the two cases. I will mention one further fact, for all these facts to my mind seem very relevant to the discussion, as showing that the Bill we are now discussing—although undoubtedly in certain respects it is an improvement upon the existing law—will not touch even the fringe of the question so far as Wales is concerned. Every question in regard to agricultural reform turns upon one or two considerations. First, there is the question of fixity of tenure. During the first eighty years of this century the rents of the whole of England rose 16·3 per cent., whereas with regard to the rents in Wales during the same period they rose 69·9 per cent. This fact in regard to the greatly enhanced rise of rent in Wales, as compared with England during the present century is a fact of fundamental importance in the case we are now discussing. That is the reason why I feel that, although I have come some of the provisions of the Bill, we should make it perfectly clear what the state of agriculture in Wales really is, and prove that Wales in every respect is in a worse condition than England. Wales has had a certain amount of relief, although only temporary, by the rise in prices, but beyond that the question is one of very great importance when we realise the enormous population which is going on in the rural districts of Wales. Here are some facts which will explain the position clearly to the House: At the beginning of this century the population of Wales was about 500,000, but since that time it has increased 100 per cent. On the side with this upward movement of the population in Wales there is this other fact, that from the year 1840 and onwards there has been an alarming decrease in the agricultural population. I will give two instances bearing upon this fact: a rural sanitary district of which I have personal knowledge, and where there were in the year 1891 over 100,000 less people living there than ten years before, and during the last fifty years there has been an actual increase in the rural population of the country. It falls short of the natural increase of 132,000 people. This question of the draining of the population in the rural districts is a very serious one. First of all it has a very direct bearing upon the labour problem, and no one who has knowledge whatever of the agricultural conditions of Wales and Welsh life can deny that this is a very serious question at the present moment, and unless something is done of a far more drastic nature than will be accomplished by this Bill, I fear that the agricultural outlook for Wales from this standpoint is not a bright one. But not only is the constant draining of the best life from the rural districts a serious matter from an agricultural point of view, but it is also a serious matter from a national standpoint. I would like to corroborate what has been said in regard to the best of Wales lying in the rural districts, and depends very largely upon agric whether these people remain not. If you want them to re-he soil you must make the con-their life more satisfactory. I this Bill, though it is a step nce, and a step in the right , is a very small measure. I will ctly frank with the Government. differ from my hon. friend below ayng that I never expected them y out the wishes of the great y of the tenant farmers of Wales rd to the unanimous recommenda-f that Commission. I recognise that fact, but theless I feel it my duty, as repre- g a large agricultural constituency, y that, although I welcome this l Bill, I do not accept it as a solution ae Welsh land question.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, : I cannot entirely agree with what A from my hon. friend who last spoke to this Bill being altogether a very all step in the right direction. In the w remarks I shall make I shall point out at this Bill is distinctly a retrograde measure from the position taken up in the ct of 1883. At any rate, the intention f the Legislature in 1883, however effective in working out, seems to me o represent a more progressive stage of gislation, judged from the point of view f the tenant farmer and of agriculture, han the present Bill does. I have been ntitled to form an opinion on the Welsh question, because the Agriculture Com- nission on which I sat examined a arge number of Welsh witnesses as well s witnesses from England and Scotland. The Welsh witnesses were gentlemen of great ability, and some of them strong epresentatives of the landlord interest n Wales. I remember one witness in articular, Mr. Tennant, gave extremely mportant evidence from the landlords' oint of view which went to establish nanswerably the general case referred o by my hon. and learned friend. I annot quite assent to the attitude which ny hon. friends have taken up in sepa- ating the Welsh land question absolutely rom the question of agricultural hold- ngs in England and Scotland. Granting he full strength of the historical arguments as affecting the tenure of land, I cannot admit for a moment that the economic arguments or the legal and equitable arguments are at all different in the case of Welsh farmers from similar arguments in the case of tenant farmers in England and Scotland. After very careful consideration of the evidence it seems to me that the arguments are very much the same as those which induced Sir James Caird and other thoughtful economists and agricultural reformers to advocate much the same group of reforms for England and Scotland which the Welsh Land Commission recommended for Wales. I wish to make my own position clear with regard to the Report of the Welsh Land Commission, because I do not admit that any special reasons—economic or legal—exist for the carrying out of these reforms in Wales which do not exist to an almost equal or even a greater extent in some of the counties of England and Scotland. Before the House assents to the Third Reading of this Bill, as I have no doubt it will, I wish in the first place to express my personal regret that the President of the Board of Agriculture is unable to be present to-night to bring this Bill to a conclusion, much as I differ from many of the arguments which he has advanced during the passage of the measure through the House. It seems to me that this Bill represents a large extension of the power of the landlords in this country. I do not know if the House generally realises how much greater the power of the landlords will be in dealing with their tenants as a result of this Bill. In the first place, while the Bill does not carry out a change suggested by many agricultural reformers, that both parties should have equal rights to put the Act into operation, it gives to the landlord the right to bring the whole of the claims he can make at common law into arbitration as a set-off against the claim of the tenant, and the landlord's claim can now be enforced even if it exceeds the amount which the tenant can prove to be due to him for improvements. This is a distinct and very important alteration of the law. Under the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 the landlord could not enforce any counterclaim for a large amount than the amount awarded as compensation to the tenant. If a tenant established a claim for improvements £200 under the schedule of the Act 1883, and his landlord were able to se a counter-claim for dilapidations for £300 or £400, he would not be able to recover more than £200; but by the present Bill the landlord can enforce his full claim even if it exceeds the claim established by the tenant. Then, again, he has a longer period for introducing his claim. Seven days after the commencement of the arbitration he may spring any number of claims on the tenant—claims which in my opinion ought not to be sprung on the tenant at all. In some parts of Scotland and also in Lincolnshire arbitrators have held that a receipt for rent should be held to bar claims for previous dilapidations, and that estates ought to be managed so carefully that it should be the duty of the landlord to inform the tenant at the earliest possible moment if he were not properly treating the land, and that arrears for dilapidation and waste should not be allowed to accumulate, and that therefore the landlord should be prevented from springing such unlimited claims on the tenant. Then, again, I maintain that it is a very wrong thing for the Government to provide no limitation whatever after two of its members—the President of the Local Government Board and the President of the Board of Agriculture—had signed a recommendation that in regard to yearly tenancies the limit for counter-claims should be two years. The present limit is four years, and the universal demand has been that it should be limited to two years, but under this Bill the landlord would be perfectly free to set up counter-claims without any limitation whatever, unless, of course, the tenant set up the statute of limitations to bar that. That would mean at best a six years limit, and the result will be that many tenants will be frightened out of making any claim whatever for improvements by the fact that the landlord might bring in unlimited counter-claims, and so place them in the invidious position of having to set up the statute of limitations. That is placing the tenant in a very unfair position. The third point in which it seems to me that the position of the landlord is strengthened is the alteration with regard to freedom of sale of produce. The President of the Board of Agriculture has stated that he will introduce in another place some further alterations into the fourth subsection of Clause 1, but the Bill as it stands will undoubtedly place the landlord in a position in which he can bar the right of freedom by special agreement as to the sale of manurial return, and in the case of holdings near large towns where it has been understood that there was to be freedom, the tenant sending or producing and carting back manure, a fair arrangement might thus be secured. The next point in which the landlord is placed in a stronger position than he now is, is that the parties will not be on equality as regards the serving of notices. The main extension of the landlord's power is one, however, which I think neither the House nor the country have fully grasped the meaning of. It is rather a difficult question to explain, but I found myself when I endeavoured to explain it to some practical farmers at a Council Meeting of the Chamber of Agriculture in Westminster Hall. The first subsection of Clause 2 undoubtedly gives a landlord a power which he does not at present possess of depriving his tenant of any right to have recourse to the arbitration procedure provided under the Act. The landlord will now be enabled to enter on an agreement in regard to arbitration not only as to the conditions under which settlements are to be arrived at, but that on his estate all disputes are referred to Mr. So and So. It is not possible that the landlord and tenant should be free to agree as to the scales of compensation for various improvements at the beginning of the tenancy. It is perfectly reasonable that when a tenant has made for compensation for improvements at the end of the tenancy, the mode of payment should be subject to agreement, but there is a trifling difference between the old Act and the Bill, because under the Bill the landlord is bound to have regard to a tenant's agreement that may be in force at the time. An agreement may have been entered into years and years before without arbitration of the special circumstances which the tenancy may be tenanted under, and it is not in the interest of a reasonable procedure we are proposing in the Bill that we should give to the landlord the power of being able to say to the tenant, "The clause in your agreement which prevents your doing anything under the Act. You may think you are entitled to proceed to arbitration provided by the Act of Parliament, but your agreement bars that, and you are also sy." That is a very important principle, and I may say I was disappointed when the right hon. Member for the President of the Board of Agriculture finally refused to remove enormous power from the hands of landlords. It seems to me that this "take it or leave it" Bill, and that landlords and agents will be enabled to state agreements on the tenants or they are in a strong enough position. For these and other reasons I feel strongly as to the character of this Bill, if this tremendous power were taken from the landlords, might, with amendments, be made a very useful and valuable measure. I now turn to the details of the picture. What does the Bill get out of this Bill? He gets the right to make a garden under one acre, the right to plant an orchard, also under one acre, and the right to make osier beds on one acre. He will also get a few shillings for the droppings of his horses, which will be a most trivial compensation. There is also a trivial concession for arable pasture. And even that is wholly prospective. I put down, in pursuance of the suggestion of Mr. Sewell Read, a proviso that in the case of temporary pasture, compensation would be given for the improvement made not more than three years before the end of the tenancy; but even this concession was rejected when moved by the hon. friend the Member for Hampshire. I should have thought that some appreciation of what the tenant farmers of England, especially in the 14 Counties, have done during the last 20 years to keep themselves and the country going would have been shown. But the concessions which have been made to the tenants are really too trivial to mention. There will be no real extension of powers under this Bill, whereas enormous powers are given to the landlords.

I must say that I do wish that we had in this House a few representatives of farming interest. That would be a good thing for us, and I would not wonder whether they sat on the Conservative benches or on these benches; I welcome them all the same. The Government have rejected many suggestions made by the Chambers of Agriculture, and many suggestions by the Commissions; they have rejected the principle of giving the tenant freedom in carrying out improvements suitable for his holding, and the principle that a tenant farmer should be placed in the same position as every other temporary holder of real estate who is dispossessed of it and loses trade interests and goodwill thereby. The Government have also rejected the Amendment, which was supported by the Chamber of Agriculture, as regards the laying down of permanent pasture. It seems to me that the tenant farmers of England, who are mainly supporters of the party opposite, have been treated in this Bill with singular ingratitude. The Government have thrown away an enormous opportunity of dealing with a great economic question which is of vast importance to the country. It was the best type of tenant farmers who during the period of depression kept the landlords going, proving that agriculture in qualified hands is a sound and progressive industry. But it is a terrible thing that, as a conclusion of all these Commissions and inquiries, and as a wind up of all the information which has been received as to the causes of agricultural depression, this trumpery measure should be the result, and that it should give increased powers to the landlords, who have done so much to hinder agriculture in the past, and should have no regard for the equitable rights of the tenants or the economic rights of the State.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): I should like to deal with the debate as far as it has progressed. It is significant to us on this side of the House that the debate should have been opened by a Scotch Member who dwells in London, and who has never owned or occupied any agricultural land whatever. Then we have had the intervention of the distinguished representative from England who has just sat down, and, in accordance with his reputation, he has spoken at great length. I cannot help telling the hon. Member, in all courtesy and all straightforwardness, that in the general opinion of all agriculturists in this country, whether occupiers or owners, inasmuch as he has not had the advantage of any practical acquaintance with the subject, he is regarded merely as an agricultural phonograph, and that agriculturists are not prepared to accept his opinions on these questions. If there is one branch of industry more than another with which it is necessary that a man should have a practical acquaintance before he lays down the law, it is agriculture. We have heard nothing but groans from our acquaintance, who has nothing whatever to do with the practical management of land either as farmer or owner. He has been talking in many instances to those who have spent their whole lives as owners or farmers, and who knew the practical economic conditions of land management. The propositions which he has laid down are for the most part rotten and altogether untenable, and would never have been laid down by anyone who had not the audacity of ignorance in these matters. We have heard of the intervention of Scottish pedants, and of the agricultural phonographs, but the intervention of the Welsh Members is of another character. I welcome with all cordiality their perfectly different tone. The name oftenest used by the Welsh Members in support of their views is that of a noble relative of mine; but perhaps I have talked over this subject more frequently with him than they have, and know more of his opinions than they do. I have the honour and pleasure of being the representative of an English constituency separated from Wales only by an imaginary line. Therefore, it can well be imagined that the Welsh case has particular interest for me; and sometimes I could not help wondering whether the hon. Members from Wales have not mistaken their own case. At any rate, these hon. Members will not accuse me of any want of courtesy if I do not agree with them. Some of their arguments are difficult to understand. One hon. Member said that the loss when a change of tenancy occurred was very considerable to the tenant; but it should be remembered that the loss to the owner is just as great as to the tenant. Then something was said about the acute differences which exist in Wales, because the landlord holds a creed different from that of his tenant, the landlord being a member of the Established Church, and the tenant a Nonconformist. But we have instances in England, Scotland, Ireland, and parts of Wales where large landowners belong to the Roman Catholic Church, and yet they are on absolutely good terms with the Protestant tenants on their estates. I do not think it is a sound argument to say that in Wales there is an acute divergence between landlord and tenant because they have different creeds. We were told of the reasons why Wales had a difference of treatment to the rest of the United Kingdom was that, naturally, the agricultural population was decreasing, and that the competition for farms was enormous. It is to me that these arguments are contradictory and self-destructive. The statement was made that in Wales there had been a very considerable rise in the value of the rental of land. Let the Gentleman who used that argument go into an estate office and see the increase in the amount spent on the land and on farm buildings by the landlord. For many years I have been a trustee on the largest estate in Wales, and I can say without fear of contradiction that the expenditure of years on estates in Wales has been great as to justify, at any rate, improvement in the rent. It is to me that the argument has been raised that there has been a demand for land than in England; there not something in this: that in England there are smaller holdings and farms than exist in some portions of Wales? It is well known that in England the demand for small farms is considerable and satisfactory, but the demand for large farms is often very great. I come to another question of which I may be expected to know something, and which I have a warm feeling for Wales, the tie of neighbourhood and family. I live in the county I represent, which is only separated from Wales by an imaginary line. There are several parts in Shropshire and partly in the Welsh border. Now I have said that on these estates, on one side of a river or high road, there is absolute improvement on the part of the tenants, and absolutely none of it on the other side, as described by hon. Gentlemen upon merely crossing the river or high road to find tenants, who hold from the landlord and on the same terms, and yet have a hopeless and burning desire for improvement of their condition. It merely shows that where the English system has been introduced with the greatest vigour, there the national desires seem to have become less acute. The argument, therefore, is to find fault with the English system and to introduce the Welsh system.

Colonel Keayon-Sloney.

Bill, which the hon. Gentleman is champion and uphold. Although I admit the right hon. Gentleman has a right to use the results of the Land Commission in his favour, in my opinion that the attempt to do so at I believe to be an absolutely distinction between the condition in Wales and that of England must be very bad in the first instance to the farmers. I cannot help feeling that when we thresh out this question we shall approach a state of things in which Wales will not be unwilling to learn what England has to teach, and England will be unwilling to learn what Wales has to teach. I believe that there is rather a strong desire in the background on the part of some hon. Gentlemen to create a law dangerously akin to that dual system which has been the curse of the Welsh Isle. I am therefore one of those who welcome this Bill, all the more because it is not what it is the fashion to make of a drastic Bill. I am afraid drastic legislation is generally dangerous legislation introduced by the most ignorant members of the legislature. Therefore, although as this Bill proceeds on moderate terms, it is, I believe, all the more likely to be useful. Though it does not embody all the suggestions which would have wished, it does embody many which are extremely valuable and likely to do good. It does as far as many of those interested in agriculture would have liked to go; it may be amended in that direction at a future time. It, however, meets the want of remedy, and will place the relations of landlord and tenant on a new footing. It may be that some members of Parliament will take up all the questions of agricultural tenancy, and codify it in a form which will be much more valuable than now to people who are content with the law. I think the Bill given to the Bill has been in accordance with its merits. Those who have no political end in view, but who desire to see a moderate change in agricultural and social conditions in the United Kingdom, welcome the Bill, and the Government may rest assured that it will be so received in all parts of the country.

LLOYD-GEORGE (Cardiff): I cannot congratulate the hon. and gallant Member for Newport on the very excitable performance which he has just made, which can only be explained on the suspicion that the hot weather has affected him. His attack on the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire was exceedingly uncalled for and unjustifiable. I attended some of the meetings of the Grand Committee on Trade when this Bill was under discussion, and I found my hon. friend addressing himself to the details of the Bill in a most intelligent manner, which showed that his study of the questions at issue had been very thorough. It is remarkable that, although the hon. Member for Newport made this attack in sweeping terms on the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire, he has not condescended to address himself to a single point of criticism of the Bill before the House. The hon. Gentleman has taken upon himself to speak on behalf of the tenant farmers of Wales as well as of England. He complained of my hon. friend as being a mere agricultural phonograph, but I cannot say that my hon. friend is a phonograph of Welsh opinion. The Welsh farmers have spokesmen on their own behalf, although it seems to have been reserved for the hon. Gentleman who represents the English constituency of Newport to voice the real grievances of the Welsh tenant farmers. The hon. Member said that he had a practical acquaintance with agriculture, but he will allow me to say that his views on this subject are rather vitiated, to the extent that he represents only one party and not the other. His views on this question might be as unconscionable as mine would be on a bill of costs. After all, he represents the landlord interest, and he understands it from that point of view. Undoubtedly he knows something about Welsh estates; but, unfortunately, he represents the best Welsh estates. He does not know anything of the Welsh estates of which we complain, and to which both the majority and the minority of the Welsh Commission referred. If all the estates were managed like those with which the hon. Member is identified, I venture to say that the Welsh land question would never have reached the acute phase which the House is forced to recognise as now existing, by the fact that we are taking three or four hours in discussing these points. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman is not a very good witness in a matter of that sort. I disagree with the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire as much as the hon. Member for Newport on certain points. Neither of the two hon. Members really understands the Welsh land question. My hon friend, it is true, sat on the Agricultural Commission, and upon the basis of certain evidence given before that Commission he comes to the conclusion that the Welsh question is practically identical with the English question. I will tell the hon. Member why he should not come to that conclusion. The Welsh tenant farmers in fact practically ignored that Commission. The only evidence given was by Welsh landowners and agents, and only one or two tenants. But before the Welsh Land Commission evidence was given by Welsh tenant farmers from all over Wales, and they did not think it worth their while to come up to London to give evidence before the English Commission, especially when, with one or two exceptions, they had no confidence in its members. The real difficulty in the case of Wales is not altogether economic. It is to a large extent a question of sentiment. It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to say that when he comes to Shropshire he finds no difficulty. But it is very curious that wherever you get a Celtic peasantry, whether it be in the Highlands of Scotland, or in Ireland, or in Wales, there is the same difficulty—namely, the sentimental clinging to the soil, which renders it hard for them to judge the question of rent from a purely commercial point of view, impartially and calmly; it seems to hamper their judgment altogether. The hon. Gentleman knows very well that when you get hold of one of these peasants on a small farm in the hills, he will pay any rent up to the last penny in his possession before he will quit his farm. It is not the owners of estates represented by the hon. Member for Newport that will take advantage of that sentiment. They know that these men are very good tenants. But the difficulty comes in when you come to the small landowners, especially when you come to the men who invest in land and want it to pay 4 and 5 per cent. These take advantage of the sentimental weakness of the peasant, and utilise that in order to raise the rent and extort from him the uttermost farthing; and when that fails they let the holding to another man who would be also ready to pay his last penny. The English tenant, on the other hand, is much cooler in a more or less commercial transaction. He says, "This is not pay me," and he gives it up. Fortunately that is not the case of the small farmers in Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, who go on borrowing money from other to keep on their holdings, and the whole community is more or less corrupt. I wish to call attention to the way in which the Government has been dealing with these Commissions of Agriculture and the Land Commission. We have had an Agricultural Commission for England and Wales, which made three recommendations. They were in an interim Report in 1896, and at the moment it was presented there was a great deal of opposition to it—so far as it was applicable to the landlords—almost the same opposition with which it was written. Then we waited for two or three years until we got the final Report of the Commission, with recommendations in favour of the tenant farmer; but no session passed before we got the final Report. And what do we find? That it does not carry out the moderate recommendations of that Commission, as short even of the recommendations of the most favourable to the tenant farmer ever presented to Parliament. It is the way in which the landlords and tenant farmers of England have been treated by the Government. Well, there is the Welsh Land Commission, which presented a Report at the end of 1895. There were a few recommendations made unanimously by the Commission, which included the recommendation of Baronet the Member for Lord Kenyon, and Professor the Member for London—all Liberal Unionists, but men who understood Welsh agricultural questions, and who were large landlords. Surely the Government might have taken their recommendations, because they represented the opinion of the Welsh tenant farmer, but they absolutely ignored the recommendations. Then there was a Commission on Local Taxation, which presented an interim Report in favour of the tenant farmer, and another section of the supporters of the Government, and embodied in legislation in the Local Taxation Act. That is the way in which these Commissions and their Reports have been treated. Whenever there is a recom-avourable to the landlords and eminent supporters, we get legislation when it is for the benefit of the farmer we get a niggardly bill before the House.

LUMPHREYS - OWEN (Montgomery): I have only a few words to support of the strong case which has been made out by my hon. friend, but unwilling to give a silent vote to the matter, because this is the only opportunity I shall have of giving voice to the opinion of the great majority of constituents. We have heard that there is very little difference between the English and Welsh cases, but that is only the fact that while the English have dealt freely with the Bill the Welsh Members have not. It is worth while to criticise the Bill, but have spoken on the subject of my hon. friend the Member for East Glamorganshire. He says to me that the provision for compensation is good so far as it goes, but it does not meet the demands of the Welsh people. It has been said that the ordinary relation of landlord and tenant created by English law is as good as no Christian man would accept, and no sane man would accept, and that is a great deal of truth in that. Something has been done to correct the inequity of the law by the Agricultural Acts, but there are still relationships which are involved in the relation of landlord and tenant. The use of the doctrine that whatever is in the soil adheres to the soil as the property of the landlord—that the landlord to confiscate the improvements of the tenant; and the second principle of tenure, which by law is a year to year. I am quite sure that the English tenant regards his position as tenant far more from a commercial point of view than the Welshman. A short time ago a friend of mine that in his part of the country it is a regular thing for tenants, felt the least disinclination to move on their farms, to give notice at all to remove elsewhere, without the consideration as to whether it was a Welsh home or not. Now I can speak with considerable confidence of the temperament, and I can say that a Welsh tenant does not move from a farm upon which his ancestors have lived without great difficulty or great disagreement with his landlord, and when he does move he does not move far. He desires to live in the same parish, or at any rate the same county. He does not so much want to be compensated for improvements which he has made as to be secure in his holding. My hon. and gallant friend the Member for Newport spoke of Shropshire, and I do not deny that he is perfectly acquainted with that county and the parts of Wales bordering on that county, but it is a matter of common knowledge that there is debateable land on the frontier between two different races where the one blends into the other, and that is the case with Wales and Shropshire. English influence has spread along the valley of the Severn, and the farmers on the east side are a very different class to the farmers on the hills on the west side, and what my hon. and gallant friend said of his Flint and Denbigh neighbours may be perfectly true, but when you come to the men who live upon the hills, who speak Welsh as their native language, and only speak English for its commercial convenience, you come to a totally different economic condition of things. Those are the men who, above all, are pressing for security of tenure in their holdings. My hon. and gallant friend made the claim on behalf of Welsh landlords that they had spent a great deal of money upon building, but, if he is cognisant of the management of a large estate, he may have had to deal with borrowing from land improvement companies for improving estates held by tenants for life, and if he has he will know that as a rule the justification given to the Board of Agriculture for imposing these burdens on the fee simple is that they are needed to maintain the existing rents. My strong inclination is to believe that the expenditure which has been made upon different estates, though excellent in itself, is an expenditure which does not justify the raising of rents, but one which simply puts the house in a condition in accordance with modern civilisation, and the modern standard of comfort. With regard to dual ownership, I do not advocate it, and I have heard it disclaimed by the Welsh farmers, who do not want it. They want security of tenure against capricious eviction. The days of capricious eviction are over, but apprehensions of it still prevail, and it is a great social evil that the Welsh farmers think themselves unable to speak out their minds in matters of politics or religious conviction lest it should lead to such capricious eviction. I regret that the Government, from their fanatical desire for uniformity, have refused to give consideration to the special case of the Welsh tenant farmer, and hope that if they have another lease of power they will take care to do so in a future session.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): I very much regret the absence of my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Agriculture, but I think that, had he been here, he would have had every reason to be satisfied with the debate that has taken place. There has been in all parts of the House a recognition of the fact that the Bill marks a substantial step in advance. All are agreed that the Bill is not quite satisfactory, but in all quarters it has been recognised that it has done a great deal in simplifying the procedure, and that it has done away with one grievance—that it has enlarged the scope in which compensation can be claimed in urban districts. It is true that we have had expressions of satisfaction from all quarters, and the only exception from the general unanimity has been in the speech of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire, who denounced the Bill root and branch; but I appeal from the hon. Member to the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture, a highly representative body, and one thoroughly conversant with the subject both in practice and theory. That Chamber formally declared that the Bill would be of substantial benefit to landed proprietors as well as to tenants, and would contribute to a considerable extent to promote the interests of agriculture in the country. The criticisms of English Members have been devoted entirely to details, and in some of these criticisms they are wrong. The hon. Member for East Northamptonshire appears to think the Bill confers on the landlords, with regard to claims, privileges which they did not previously enjoy. The hon. Member is absolutely mistaken. The main object of the Bill is to do what is in the interests of landlord and tenant alike. The hon. Member has lost himself in details and has failed to appreciate what the scope and object of the Bill are. Passing to the other criticisms of the Welsh Members, it is recognised that, while the Bill does not do what they could wish, it makes a substantial step in advance. This will be a source of satisfaction to the President of the Board of Agriculture. It was suggested that Wales should be accorded separate treatment in respect of agricultural holdings. Wales would lose more than it could gain if separate treatment was not provided. The hon. Member for Carmarthen said the population of Wales was small, and there was such "earth-hunger" that the tenants would pay any rent rather than quit their homes. I do not think this is a matter of race; it is a matter of economic conditions. In many parts of the country, due to accidental circumstances, there are no facilities for enterprise of any kind. There are no industrial opportunities, and the only career a man has open to him is to farm in the same way as his fathers did before him. As new industries are opened up the most serious symptoms of this "earth-hunger" will disappear in Wales as elsewhere. Complaint has been made that the Bill of the Welsh Land Commission with regard to the circumstances of Welsh agriculture has been ignored; but it is not to say that, because several very important recommendations of the Commission have been given effect to in the Bill. Then, three suggestions have been made. The first was that there ought to be compensation for disturbance, and, in the case of fixity of tenure. I ask hon. Members who make that suggestion to bear in mind that there is an increasing disinclination on the part of farmers to bind themselves down on the land for any long period. Is a tenant farmer to have the right to stay as long as he likes on the land, while he is not to be bound to stop as long as the landlord may desire to have him as tenant? You cannot have one-sided legislation of that sort. Another provision made was that some provision ought to have been made for securing compensation for improvements to the sitting tenant as distinguished from the quit tenant. Is a tenant to be able to require the landlord to buy his improvements, and then to have the benefit of them without paying any rent in return of them? If we give compensation, the inevitable result must be that what one pocket we must take out of it. A third suggestion was that of estates in Wales which got the Board of Agriculture appointed a sort of assessor to the Board of Chancery and advise the Board to the management of the estates.

There are grave objections to the system of dual management. The hon. Member for South-east suggested that the law affecting the Board should be codified. I should like to see such codification taken if it would be useful; but I do not believe the ordinary tenant would find the benefit arising from it. hon. Members expect. Anyone wants to know the law about agriculture will get a much better idea out of a book than out of an Act of Parliament.

If I want to know anything with regard to a subject with which I am not conversant I would much rather take up a book, from which I should be able to get a better view than by passing through an Act of Parliament. We ought not to attach too much importance to the actual wording of an Act of Parliament. There is never any of men in the profession to which I attach the honour to belong who are ready to explain the most obscure Acts of Parliament, and who are ready to bring out the points, in which everything is made as plain as possible. On the whole, I ask the House without a dissentient voice to pass the Third Reading to this Bill.

HERBERT LEWIS (Flintshire): I wish to join in the expression of regret at the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture, and also in the protest against this Bill as an entirely insufficient measure to meet the needs of the Welsh tenant farmer. I am surprised the Government continue to give any object lessons as to the utter folly of appointing Royal Commissions.

I imagine the time is not far distant when gentlemen who are well qualified to serve on Royal Commissions absolutely decline to do so, if they have any self-respect whatever, because of the recommendations in the case of Commission after Commission have been deliberately set aside by even the Government which appointed the Commission. In the case of the particular Commission here concerned, exception has been taken to it because it was appointed by a Liberal Government. But it had upon it gentlemen who command the confidence of the vast majority of hon. Gentlemen opposite—men like the hon. Baronet the Member for Swansea Town and Lord Kenyon. I might give instances of other Royal Commissions, appointed by Conservative and Unionist Governments, which have made identically the same recommendations, and which recommendations are before the House in the form of Bills, and yet—I do not know whether it is because they relate to Wales—those recommendations have been absolutely rejected by the present Government. I venture to think that this is not a proper course of proceeding, and I trust that in future we shall have a little more attention paid to the findings of these Royal Commissions. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken has attacked the position which we, as representing Welsh constituencies, have taken up. He has practically denied that there is any difference whatever between Wales and England in regard to the conditions under which land is held. One of the reasons he gave for the land hunger that exists in Wales is that the industrial openings in Wales are few as compared with those in other parts of the kingdom. That, however, is not the case. There are plenty of industrial openings both in North and in South Wales. The families of tenant farmers and labourers who have hitherto been in the employ of tenant farmers have at the present time the most abundant opportunities possible of leaving the country, of serving on railways, of going to factories, mines, or quarries. So far as industrial openings are concerned, they exist in North and South Wales to as great an extent as in most other parts of the Kingdom. The hon. and learned Gentleman controverted the argument that that land hunger arises very largely from the fact that Wales has been peopled by a Celtic race. The hon. and learned Gentleman adduced some instances in which there has been Teutonic blood in the Celtic races, but there was one consideration he entirely forgot in regard to Wales, and that was the language. In Wales nearly a million people speak the Welsh language, and a very large proportion of that million speak Welsh alone. They hear of openings in the rural districts of England, but they do not avail themselves of them. Why is that the case? It is because the Welsh language is the language of their hearts and their homes, the language they have heard all their life, the language in which they have worshipped from earliest infancy. Hon. Members have very little idea of the enormous wrench it is to a Welshman, who has been accustomed to speak and to be spoken to and to worship in the Welsh language, to leave his home for other parts, even for a part in which he is certain to make his fortune, and to live under infinitely better economic conditions than obtain in Wales. If the hon. and learned Gentleman knew more of Wales in this respect he would understand that the sentimental tie—if so you like to call it—is extremely strong, and that it binds a Welshman to his own home and to the country in which his language is spoken. There are other considerations as well. We have heard that holdings in Wales are comparatively small, but the hon. Member for Newport appeared to think the conditions were practically the same in England as in Wales in this respect. I can only take the country as a whole. The holdings from twenty to fifty acres are over 20 per cent. of the total of holdings in Wales, as compared with 14 per cent. in England; and the holdings of from sixty to a hundred acres are over 16 per cent. of the holdings in Wales and only about 10 per cent. in England. Then again with regard to labour—and I would especially call attention to this point—the average number of labourers employed varies from ten in the eastern counties of England to five in the western counties on each farm; in Wales the number of labourers is from one and a half to two on each farm. As further illustrating the economic difference between England and Wales in this respect, I may say that the Welsh farmers, their families, and the labourers boarded on the farms, do two-thirds of the work of the farm; in England they do only one-third. I will give very shortly some official figures which show that the land hunger in Wales must have affected very materially indeed the rents originally charged in that country. The variations in the agricultural assessments to income tax for the twenty-nine years ending April, 1894, show that the rents in the seven eastern counties of Wales have fallen to the level at which they stood in 1864; in the six western counties they are now, in spite of depreciation, 18½ per cent. higher than they were in 1864, or, taking the whole of Wales together, the net increase amounts to 7·8 per cent. In England, on the other hand, the rents have risen 15·2 per cent. below the level of 1864. It is therefore perfectly obvious that there is a considerable difference between England and Wales in this respect. The one thing I very deeply regret in connection with this Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman has spoken of it as having been agreed by us to be a substantial step in advance. I wish it were. It is a step in advance, otherwise we should be challenging the Third Reading; but to say we agree it is a substantial step in advance is, I think, going a little further than is warranted by the circumstances of the case. I regret that the clause proposed by the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire was not included in the Bill. It was based upon the unanimous recommendation of the Welsh Land Commission. The recommendation was that where a tenant was capriciously evicted—that is to say, received notice to quit his holding for inadequate reasons, or for any other cause than that he had not paid his rent, or that he had persisted in permitting waste, and so forth—the tenant ought to be permitted to claim, in addition to the compensation due under the Act of 1883, some compensation for disturbance. I regret that that has not been introduced into this Bill. If that clause had been inserted it would have been regarded by the Welsh tenant farmers as a great concession, and we should have been able to say without any reservation that this Bill was indeed a substantial step in advance. It seemed to me that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not deal adequately with the question of mortgagees in possession and of trustees. There are cases in which trustees, owing to their position as trustees, are absolutely bound to things which, perhaps, if they had sole and unfettered discretion, as individual or private owners would have, they would not dream of doing. I have cases of that kind in my mind, and there are cases also in which there are mortgagees in possession; they have none of the social restraints of independent landlords; they may be persons

POST OFFICE SITES BILL.

[THIRD READING.]

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read the third time.”

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) did not wish to weary the House, but there were two or three points he desired to have on record. He understood that although the Secretary to the Treasury was unable to assent to the striking out of Sub-section 3 of Clause 1, he was prepared to recommend that, as far as possible, the Treasury should pay the local authorities the rates during the demolition of buildings until the post office was built. He further understood that in future the plans should be made accessible to Members of the House. The right hon. Gentleman also promised to give some information as to the persons to be displaced, and it was further understood that the special privileges given to the City Corporation should be extended to the other local authorities affected. As to Clause 9, it would be an improvement if it were omitted altogether, as it was absolutely unnecessary.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HANBURY, Preston) thought he had satisfied the hon. Member when the Bill was in Committee. He was perfectly ready to give the assurance with regard to the rates. With regard to the number of persons to be displaced, the Standing Order did not apply in London if less than twenty houses were taken. That did not happen under the Bill, as in Whitechapel there were only three and in Southwark fourteen. There was, however, one case in which, if this were an ordinary private Bill, the Standing Order would apply, and that was the case of Bristol. There forty houses were to be taken, thereby dispossessing about 194 occupants. It was not really possible to enforce any such Order on the Crown, but he agreed that it was perfectly right and just that a rule which applied to private bodies should hold good as regarded the Crown in a case of this kind, and the Solicitor to the Post Office agreed with him that in a case of this kind provision should be made for the people displaced.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

COUNTY COURTS (INVESTMENT OF DEPOSITS) BILL [Lords].

Order for consideration, as amended, read.

MR. CALDWELL pointed out that in Ireland the repayment of deposits might be made by an Order either of the Lord Chancellor or the county court. In England it was by an Order of the Treasury. It was a little strange that the Treasury should be asked to make an Order in a civil matter in regard to which they could do practically nothing. Under the Workmen's Compensation Act there was practically the same subject dealt with, and there the Order was by the Treasury or the county court. That seemed to be the correct form, and it was a pity it was not adhered to in this case.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY had no doubt due weight would be given to the general observations of the hon. Member with regard to the desirability of uniformity.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

LUNACY BOARD (SCOTLAND) (SALARIES, ETC.) BILL.

Order for consideration, as amended, read.

MR. CALDWELL stated that when this Bill was first brought in it proposed to establish an entirely new principle. Five hundred pounds a year was to be paid to men who, by Act of Parliament, were bound to discharge gratuitously, as public officials, the duty for which that payment was proposed to be made. The clause to which exception was taken having been expunged, there was now no objection to the Bill passing.

OIL IN TOBACCO BILL.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1 :—

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

Mr. Hanbury.

DR. TANNER moved, "That the Chairman do report progress and leave to sit again"; but the Chairman being of opinion that the motion was an abuse of the rules of the House, he refused to propose the Question thereon to the Committee.

Clause 2 :—

Question proposed, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

DR. TANNER moved, "That the Chairman do report progress and leave to sit again"; but the Chairman being of opinion that the motion was an abuse of the rules of the House, he refused to propose the Question thereon to the Committee.

Sub-section (a) provides that a person shall not be disqualified by reason only of his having any share or interest in any lease, feu, sale, or purchase of land, or any agreement for the same. Some of the Scottish burghs have large property which is known as the Common Good, and owing to the absence of a disqualification such as this in the early days of the century a good deal of the property of the burgh was made use of. I think it is better that these words should not remain in the clause, and that if a man has a lease of land from the burgh it should disqualify him for a seat.

The clause provides that in the event of the provost being prevented at any time from fulfilling, or failing to fulfil, any of the duties of his office on account of his absence from home, or from attending any meeting or any other cause, his duty shall be performed by the senior bailie. The clause as it stands is, however, too wide, as it would put the bailie on all the committees and of which the provost is a member. INDIAN EXPENDITURE—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, I rise to call attention to the Report of the Royal Commission on Indian Expenditure; to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they propose to accept the recommendations of the Commission; and to move for copies of any correspondence between the Secretary of State for India in Council and the Treasury on the subject. The terms of reference to the Royal Commission were that they were to inquire into the administration and management of the military and civil expenditure incurred under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council, or of the Government of India, and the apportionment of charge between the Governments of the United Kingdom and of India for purposes in which both are interested. I, however, propose to confine my remarks to-day to the second head of the order of reference—namely, the apportionment of charge between the two Governments, and of that apportionment almost entirely to the charge on account of Her Majesty's forces serving in India. The history of this question is rather a sad one. For twenty-five years successive Governors General of India in Council and successive Secretaries of State for India in Council have protested against what they considered to be the excessive charge which has been put upon the revenues of India on account of Her Majesty's forces serving in that country, but with little or no result. They protested against these charges under two heads—firstly, on the pure arithmetical calculations upon which the charges were founded; and, secondly, on the ground that certain equitable considerations which ought to have been taken into account in settling how much India ought to pay had not been so taken into account. Twenty years ago I was asked to preside over a small Commission to inquire into the subject. I had the assistance of two able and distinguished public servants—Sir Thomas Secombe, of the India Office, and Sir Ralph Knox, of the War Office—and the Government, in appointing that Commission, undoubtedly intended, judging from the words Mr. Stanhope used in the House of Commons, that we should settle the whole of this vexed question. After sitting ten years we determined unanimously what the charge was by India should be on the same basis, and the result of our work was a reduction of the charges against India of £1,000,000 sterling. We then approached the question of the equitable considerations, and requested the Government to let us know what they should know what was the opinion of the Government of India on the subject. We asked the noble Viscount the Lord Privy Seal (Viscount Cranborne) who was then Secretary of State for India to confer with India, and in March 1881 he did so. The noble friend the Marquess of Lansdowne who was then Governor General sent an elaborate despatch home giving in full the opinions of the Government of India in respect to the equitable considerations which should be taken into account by the English Government in fixing the charges. I may mention, as somewhat important, that Lord Roberts was then Commander-in-Chief in India, and it was before the opinion of the Government of India came fortified by the opinion of Lord Roberts, than whom no one more capable of giving an opinion on the question. That despatch was communicated to the Commission which I presided till the autumn of 1881, more than twelve months after my receipt in this country, and then it was accompanied by two letters—one from the Secretary of State for War stating that although not objecting to the being sent us for consideration, he was not prepared to accept our opinion on the matter; and the other from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was also not prepared to accept any opinion which the Commission might express on this despatch. Of course, put any consideration of the equitable claims of India into question. I declined to press the matter, and so far as my Commission was concerned the matter dropped. I had some communication at that time with the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Goschen, and I suggested that a different kind of body should be appointed to take these matters into consideration. There was, however, as you know, a change of Government, and nothing was done till 1884 when Sir Henry Fowler, then Secretary of State for India, appointed the Commission which I now lay before your Lordships' attention. The history of this question. I think

It is to be noted that Sir Henry Fowler, in making the Commission, overweighted adding the obligation to inquire into the whole question of Indian expenditure. They had to go into very statistics from the year 1860, and it is no wonder that they were years taking evidence and three years making their Report. My noble Lord Welby has been blamed for the length of time which the Commission took in making their Report; but it must be remembered that they had to master details of the financial machinery of Government of India in England and as well as the progress of expenditure during the last forty years. I now turn to the Report of the Commission. The Report was signed by a minority of three—Sir William Wedderburn, Bart., Dadabhai Naoroji, and Mr. W. S. Peile, which I have read with attention; I will confine myself to the Report of the majority, and it is interesting to consider of whom the ten members composing it consisted. The Chairman, Lord Welby, is well known to your Lordships as having for a great many years occupied with great ability and distinction the office of Permanent Secretary of the Treasury, and has been rightly placed in the position he now occupies in your Lordships' House in consequence of that distinguished service. The next member was Mr. Leonard H. Courtney, who, as your Lordships know, was a very able and distinguished Secretary of the Treasury. The next was Mr. W. L. Jackson, who was also a very distinguished Secretary of the Treasury. The majority also included Sir E. W. Hamilton, at present a very high Treasury official; Sir Ralph Knox, Under Secretary for War; Sir James Peile, a distinguished member of the Indian Council; Sir Andrew Scoble, who was also connected with India; Mr. G. L. Ryder, a gentleman holding high office in the Treasury; and Mr. Buchanan and Mr. (now Sir) Robert Mowbray, two independent Members of Parliament. Your Lordships will see that no less than five out of the ten members who signed the Report of the Majority were either actually serving or had served in the Treasury; one was actually serving in the War Office; only two had any connection with India, and there were two independent Members of Parliament. It is to be noted that two members of the Commission, Sir Ralph Knox and Mr. Ryder, prepared the case of the War Office in answer to that which was laid before the Commission on the part of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Although the constitution of the Commission might be taken exception to on behalf of India, I take no such exception. I am perfectly satisfied with the impartiality and ability of those who served; but at any rate the English Government cannot say that there was any bias in favour of India in the composition of the Majority. Moreover, the two independent members of the Commission—Mr. Buchanan and Sir Robert Mowbray—made additional Reports, which were more favourable to India than the Report of the Majority. The main recommendations of the Report were, first, a plan for settling any questions which might in future arise as to the charge for troops, English or Indian, lent by either Government to the other. I will not go into the details of that plan, but it seems to me to be a very reasonable one, and likely to prevent the recurrence of those unfortunate disputes which have taken place between the two Governments on former occasions. There is, however, one difficulty in regard to this. It is easy enough to lay down certain cases in which there could be no direct and substantial interest to India on the one hand, or to this country on the other; but when it comes to be a question of doubt the point is, who is to decide the question? The noble Viscount opposite, Viscount Cross, when he was Secretary for India, and Sir Henry Fowler, when he held a similar position, came to the conclusion that the decision might be left to the two Governments respectively. But other high authorities, including, I believe, the noble Marquess the Prime Minister, think this would not be a proper arrangement. The second recommendation was a plan for settling smaller matters of dispute by arbitration before some judicial authority who would decide after hearing both sides. I am not particular as to what arrangement is made. What I do hope is that some plan based upon these two recommendations of the Commission will be accepted by the Government in order that these disputes may be put an end to. Your Lordships must know how unfortunate it has been that educated natives in India, who are studying these questions, should find that the Governors General, the Secretaries of State, and other high authorities have constantly asserted that India has been treated unjustly in these matters, and that no reasonable answer can be produced on the other side. The third recommendation of the Commission was that the arithmetical arrangement which was settled by the Commission over which I presided—£7 10s. per effective man—should be maintained. I trust that this will be accepted by the Government. The fourth subject is the equitable pleas raised on behalf of India, and these mainly depend on Lord Lansdowne's despatch of 25th March, 1890, to which I have referred. The summary of that despatch, given in Lord Lansdowne's evidence before the Commission, was that—

and—

“The Indian Army serves for Imperial as well as for Indian purposes.”

As regards the first plea what better authority can there be than that of Lord Lansdowne in his despatch, which is signed also by Lord Roberts? He said—

“Millions of money have been spent on increasing the Army of India, on armaments and fortifications, to provide for the security of India, not against domestic enemies, or to prevent the incursions of the warlike people of adjoining countries, but to maintain the supremacy of British power in the East. The scope of all these great and costly measures reaches far beyond Indian limits, and the policy which dictates them is an Imperial policy. We claim, therefore, that in the maintenance of the British forces in this country a just and even liberal view should be taken of the charges which should legitimately be made against Indian revenues.”

That opinion, given on the authority of Lord Lansdowne and his Council, of which Lord Roberts was a member, seems to me to settle that matter, and I do not find in the Report of the Commission any sufficient answer to this plea. The second plea namely, that the Indian Army serves for Imperial as well as for Indian purposes—it is hardly necessary to argue in view of the fact that Indian forces are now engaged in South Africa and in China. I hear that the Secretary of State for India stated to-day in another place that 20,000 men in all have left India either for the Cape of Good Hope or for China. The Commission suggested that the pleas should be considered when the taxation rate is revised, but they were not recommended in the meantime as not being of substantial relief to the Government of India of about £300,000. Speaking for myself, I wish the question could have been finally settled, but I think those who have heard the question may be content with their main arguments accepted. In part I am quite ready to accept the conclusions of the Commission as I should have done in arbitration, but with the reservation that India should receive proper compensation for the great delay in the settlement of her claims. I believe that in such negotiations the date for the payment of the award is usually fixed in regard to the date at which the matter in dispute should have been settled if both parties had exercised reasonable diligence in bringing forward their cases—no one can say that India has been in default in this respect. But the Treasury had before Lord Lansdowne's despatch stating the case before them in 1890, and the question might have been settled in 1893. Now it cannot be settled before 1901, and therefore I contend that the award, on all equitable principles, should take effect from 1893. I do not think it is too much to ask that eight years arrears of £300,000 should be paid. It is a mere trifle. Those eight years' arrears amount to £2,400,000, £2,400,000 of the Indian debt was over by this country it would only charge of about £66,000 a year on the British Exchequer. I hope Her Majesty's Government may be able to give the Lordships' House an assurance that last equitable treatment will be done to India in this long-standing controversy, and that it will be announced. The condition of the finances of India will be very serious owing to this, and if some such treatment has been suggested is carried out by the Government I feel sure that it will be exceedingly well received in India.

Moved, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for any correspondence between the Secretary of State for India in Council and the Treasury on the subject of the Report of the Royal Commission on Indian Expenditure.”—(The Earl of Northbrook)

WELBY: My Lords, I am very glad that this question should have come to the hands of my noble friend, and I am glad it has fallen into the hands of a Lord whose authority on Indian questions is second to none, but, if I may say so without presumption, it has fallen into the hands of one whose government is marked as a model of prudent financial administration. I am glad to hear my noble friend support the recommendations of the Commission, and the fact that Lord Northbrook has endorsed and supports those recommendations has great weight with Her Majesty's Government. The Commission which I had the honour to preside over, the Commission, was not unanimous. I think I can show your Lordships on the practical points which are under consideration the Commission was unanimous. It is often the case that persons connected with the immense revenues of India, men who take a keen interest in the claims and in the needs of the Indian taxpayer, sometimes forget the claims of the British taxpayer. The opinions of these persons are entitled to every consideration for practical purposes we must try to hold a just balance between the claims of the Indian taxpayer and the claims of the British taxpayer. The recommendations of the Commission, so far as the recommendations go to which Lord Northbrook has alluded, far from differing from, endorsed them, their only objection being that they did not go far enough. Therefore, I think I may venture to say that, in regard to these particular recommendations, the Commissioners were unanimous. The noble Lord has taken the somewhat wide scope of the reference to the Commission, and I do not trouble your Lordships with my remarks upon that point. It is a matter of great interest to Parliament that on an independent inquiry a verdict has been given upon the financial administration of the Indian Government during the period since it came under the direct control of Her Majesty's Government. It divides itself into two parts. The first of all, the period from 1861, when financial equilibrium was reached in 1884. Before that time the revenues of India were largely increased to meet the demands of the Mutiny, but at the end of that period I think it is fair to say that they had fallen to the level of the taxes before the

Mutiny broke out. That was the result of remarkable economy both in regard to civil and military administration. The history of financial administration in India between 1861 and 1884 was very remarkable, and is paralleled in very few countries in the world. I now come to the second period—that from 1884 to 1896. I stop at 1896 on account of the famine that followed. From 1884 to 1896, owing to the fall in exchange and the demands for military expenditure, the taxation which had been remitted was reimposed. It should, however, be mentioned that, but for the fall in exchange, the natural growth of the Indian revenue was so satisfactory that after the increased demands for military expenditure had been met there would have been left a considerable surplus applicable to the reduction of debt. In following out this review the Commissioners were struck by the satisfactory natural growth of revenue, showing, on the whole, a healthy state of things in the Empire; but it appeared to us that the increase was not more than might naturally be expected in the case of a growing Empire. I come next to the most important question of debt. The debt of India at the close of the Mutiny was what is called an unproductive debt. In the interval between the Mutiny and the date to which I have carried the review—namely, 1896—not only did the growth of that unproductive debt entirely cease—a great contrast to the closing twenty years of the administration of the East India Company, when the debt increased by leaps and bounds—but before 1896 that debt had been reduced by 25 per cent., although in the interval expenditure of no less than £23,000,000 had been incurred in war and in those famine demands which are, in a sense, unproductive. Therefore, I submit that the result of the financial administration of India since India passed under the direct control of Her Majesty's Government is such as should give satisfaction to Parliament. Further than that, the Indian Government class certain of their services under the head of commercial services which do earn a revenue. On each of these heads the Commission was able to report that the result was fairly satisfactory. The Post Office and the Telegraph have both become paying branches, and when we came to the large expenditure on irrigation we were able to report that that very large system of works, which is of immense importance to India at all times, does not impose any charge whatever on the Indian taxpayers. Passing on to the railways, I think the result is very remarkable. Although the manner in which the accounts are drawn does not show the figures favourably for a commercial result, the Commission found that, if the cost of military lines and lines simply made for famine protection, which ought to be carried to a separate account, were deducted, the commercial railways of India were paying their way, and that the Indian people had the benefit of them without a farthing of burden being placed on the present taxpayers. The Commission came to the conclusion that the financial machinery was sound, well organised, and effectively controlled. The Commission, as my noble friend informed your Lordships, did not come to its inquiry with any foregone conclusion in favour of India. It was composed largely of officials, and officials are conscious of one another's infirmities. The Report of the Commission deserves weight because it is unbiassed and unprejudiced. During the forty years that India has been under the rule of Her Majesty, her financial administration has been entrusted to faithful stewards. The system under which the finances of India are administered is sound, and one in which the Parliament may fairly have confidence. We ventured to call the attention of Her Majesty to two points: one of them was the large growth of the non-effective service. The Commission, however, pronounced no opinion upon it, knowing well that in the case of a tropical climate the non-effective service must naturally be heavy; but the growth of this service did strike us as serious, and we considered that the Indian Government ought to subject the regulations relating to that service to careful actuarial examination, so that the public might be assured that there was no extravagance. I hope the recommendations of the Commission, so far as they come from the majority, will have the favourable attention of Her Majesty's Government. I go considerably further in one respect. I do not think the audit system of India will ever be complete or perfect until the independence of the Comptroller and Auditor General is completely established. The chief desire of the Commission was to remove all plausible, or perhaps even good, grounds for complaint on the part of India. On one point we were of the fact that the Imperial Government pays, without asking any return from the Colonies, the whole cost of the India Office. I do not think the India Office on all fours with the Colonial Office. I think the India Office can consider that they are not treated like the Colonies if not a farthing is sent by the Imperial Exchequer to the India Office. I think it is a mistake to remove any such impression should arise in the minds of the Colonies. I need not enter at length into the other points. I think we were satisfied in recommending that the Imperial Government should pay half the cost of the garrison of Aden. If ever the garrison was organised as a whole, Aden might be an Imperial fortress to which the whole Empire would contribute. In the case, it is only right that the military charge of Aden should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer. In regard to one point we entered upon a rather adventurous course. We suggested up to be criticised by attempting to suggest geographical limits within which India might have a separate and distinct interest in military expeditions. The Commission deserve a certain amount of credit for their boldness if for nothing else. I think a very great end will be served, and every reason will be given for being satisfied, if it is provided that the Imperial Government will not make any contribution on India except with the assent of India, or until the assent of Parliament had been obtained. There is one other subject to which I allude, and which is of the greatest importance — namely, putting an end to administrative mismanagement. I know of no other method by which this can be put an end to except the appointment of an unbiassed and judicious man, in whom both parties have confidence — a man of judgment — who should hear both parties and give a decision which should be binding. I think both parties would accept the decision, and it would have the advantage, that the two parties would agree without going to arbitration, that they had a very good case. The recommendations of the Commission fall short in many respects of the Indian Government, and of the people of India, they would go far to remove just ought to do all that we can to diminish if not to put an end to altogether. Now, my Lords, what are the points upon which these differences of opinion arise? They are, for the most part, in connection with those undertakings of the Imperial Government in which India is supposed to have, and I think has, an interest, whether it is direct and substantial or whether it is only a comparatively small interest—they are questions in which India undoubtedly is to some extent interested. For example, the noble Lord will recollect that the Government of India agrees to pay a contribution towards the expenditure on our consular and diplomatic service in China. It agrees to pay a contribution towards the consular and diplomatic service in Persia. It agrees to pay a subsidy towards the cable which runs from Zanzibar to Mauritius, and there are certain other small consular services to which the Government of India makes contribution. Those are the most frequent cases of friction between the Departments in this country, and I for one should have been more glad if the Commission could have seen their way to make some suggestion which would enable us to get rid altogether of these subjects of difference which are constantly arising between the Departments at home; and I cannot help hoping that when we are able to give full consideration to this Report we may see some way in which we may avoid these disputes in the future. Then the noble Earl drew your Lordships' attention to certain other charges which are laid upon the Government of India, and he expressed a hope that Her Majesty's Government might in every case refer those to arbitration. I think he suggested that it should be a judicial arbitration carried on by one of Her Majesty's judges. The noble Earl on the Wool-sack may have something to say upon that. I am not sure whether he would be disposed to hold that the functions of the judges should be extended to such cases as that. But I may point out to your Lordships that, although we have not called in the services of any of Her Majesty's judges, we have called in the services of several very distinguished Members of this House and of the other House to consider and to arbitrate on differences which have arisen between the Departments. For example, the noble Earl the late Prime Minister, Lord Rose-bury, took into consideration of the apportionment of the Her Majesty's Navy in India; he came to the conclusion in years at least £117,000 was a contribution for India to make. The Earl the Chairman of Commerce House—who, although he is not a judge, I think all your Lordships with a judicial mind—was good enough to consider what should be the contribution should be paid by the Indian Government towards the mail service between country and India, and for at least years that question has been free from any possibility of conflict between the two authorities. Her Majesty's Government are quite prepared to accept the principle of arbitration. I think that we could go quite far in understanding the noble Earl to mean, namely, that there should be a permanent tribunal.

LORD WELBY: I did not say that.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW: As I understand, the noble Earl says he did not suggest that. At any rate I can say that the Government agree with the noble Earl in the desire to refer as far as possible all the larger questions of difference which may arise between the Indian Government and the Government of India to competent arbitration. To my Lords, the noble Lord who presides over the Commission whose Report your Lordships are considering expressed his opinion—which is to be found in the Report of the minority, and which I think he holds very strongly—that it is desirable that the practice of auditing in India should be assimilated to the practice of auditing in England. The recommendation was not one to which the noble Lord was able to secure the adherence of all his colleagues, and as it has not been put forward with the weight which we attach to the names of the majority, that Commission I cannot hold out much hope to him that Her Majesty's Government will give it very serious or very favourable consideration. I should, perhaps, point out to the noble Lord, that he is probably aware of it already, that in India the audit is carried on continuously by the Comptroller and Auditor General; all officials are in every department, and can check and disallow any item which it not to be charged, immediately, and the ne for the sanction of State in the course of a and, in addition to that, in India to carry on a I think the noble Lord the Report is of very a test audit, as your s a practice which does land.

: I think it does.

ONSLow: I am con- so rely upon the Report of the Commission that the audit in India is not em, and that they con- organised and efficient. and sum, I may say, of of the Government of noble Earl has referred when the noble Earl, now f State for War, was was that India is eneatment at the hands of overnment and the Imt—liberal treatment in t of the charges between ; and I think I under- Earl to say that in his ation grant of £7 10s. he is not prepared to his only point was that ion of the capitation ; revised he would plead ment for India at the ajesty's Government. I say in opposition to ropositions. My Lords, India are not small. has been a very wealthy people individually may venues are large. The arge extent altered, and oment India is labouring calamities which enlist not only of every mem- ings' House, but of every- try and throughout the ajesty's Government are this as any other mem- unity, and I can assure nd the noble Lord who a Commission that Her nment do intend to nendations of the noble the amount which, in ght to be contributed by the Imperial Government towards the revenues of India. That amount is, I think, £293,000, but the noble Lord will pardon me if I point out to him that his Commission made an error which some- what vitiates those figures. They have in estimating half the cost of the main- tenance of the establishments at Aden put it down at £108,000. Now the moiety, as a matter of fact, is Rx.108,000. Well, the good old days when ten rupees were equal to a sovereign, unfortunately, are days that are bygone, and at the present rate of exchange the noble Lord will see that that Rx.108,000 ought to be £72,000, reducing the total amount which the noble Lord thought ought to be contri- buted by Imperial revenues to Indian revenues to £257,000. Now, my Lords, I am not prepared to pledge myself to the particular items and the particular heads under which the noble Lord wished that this contribution should be made. This I can say on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that they are willing to accept the recommendations of the noble Lord's Commission, and to give at least £250,000, and probably more, towards the relief of the revenues of India. I trust that this will meet with the approval of the noble Earl, and show him that Her Majesty's Government are desirous of meting out not only equitable treatment but liberal treatment to India, and if he will give us time I hope that we shall be able to go a long way towards meeting the other recommendations which have been so ably put forward by the Commis- sion of which the noble Lord was the chairman.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I have no desire to keep the House whilst I make anything like a detailed examination of this very interesting Report. With regard to the large por- tion of it which relates to the past expen- diture and management of finance in India I can only echo what has been said by others. I think it must be extremely satisfactory to all those connected with Indian affairs to see that a Commission composed largely of what I may call British Treasury experts have pronounced so complete an encomium on the manage- ment of the finance and expenditure of India. That I think is a very valuable thing to have effected. But, my Lords, I would rather to-night deal with some of the other parts of this Report. I admit at once that I do not think it at all unreasonable that, after the Commission having taken five years to produce this Report, Her Majesty's Government should have a reasonable time to consider how they should act upon it. I never have taken, and I do not now by any means entirely take, the view that India has been unfairly treated by this country. It is very natural indeed, and very proper, that Viceroy's who go out to India should espouse the cause of India in matters in dispute between them and the Imperial Government, but I confess I do not think that their arguments have always been sound, and such as could be really acted upon. I am sorry to see that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War is not here to-night, because I wished to refer to that despatch which my noble friend who introduced the subject read to your Lordships. The whole gist of the important paragraph—the last one quoted in this Blue-book—is—

“That millions of money have been spent on increasing the Army of India, on armaments and fortifications to provide for the security of India, not against domestic enemies or to prevent the incursions of the warlike people of the adjoining countries, but to maintain the supremacy of British power in the East. The scope of all these great and costly measures reaches far beyond Indian limits, and the policy which dictates them is an Imperial policy.”

I do not agree with that statement. It may be Imperial policy; India is part of the Empire, and it must share in the policy of the Empire as long as it remains part of the Empire. I have never considered that there was any force in the complaint that India is obliged to provide a large military force at great expense to guard her frontier against external enemies, and that she should not have to maintain that force, because, forsooth, that is not an Indian interest. In all I say I trust I assume—I am bound to assume—that our presence in India is an advantage to the Indian people. Assuming that, I do not see that India on account of her connection with us is, as a rule, exposed to any dangers which she would not have to meet if she were entirely independent—nay, more, my opinion is that her position would be one of far less security than it is now if she had no connection with this country. There seems to be an idea on the part of those who administer the affairs of India in India that the military forces in India are only required for domestic purposes against the tribes on the frontier. Is there not a Power beyond the frontier—would that Power cease to exist and be a danger if we were to cease to hold India? Would the ambition which is generally attributed to that Power—and which I attribute to her in no sense of finding fault, because the ambition is a natural one, and it is because it is a natural one that it is a dangerous ambition to India—does anyone suppose that if this country ceased to be connected with India and India was left to protect herself she would be exposed to no dangers from the great frontier Empire which is actually almost on a boundary with her own possessions? My Lords, I am not by any means wishing to attribute any extraordinary designs to that Power, but I say that no one who found himself then in the position of having to administer Indian affairs with such strength as India itself would possess would for a moment neglect that danger beyond her frontier. Therefore I do not admit to the full extent, at all events, the argument used in that despatch. I think that in the past there has been some reason to complain, because it was formerly a policy which I agree with the noble Marquess opposite, the Prime Minister, is a policy which may now be considered to be, if I may use the expression, played out. It was formerly a principle of our policy that India was so deeply interested in the maintenance of the Ottoman Empire that in any case where that Empire was endangered you might fairly consider that it was a great Indian interest. Well, possibly in the past it may have been so; but if anyone looks at the condition of the world now, they will see—at least this is my opinion—that it is not very likely that in the future India will be called upon to aid this Empire in any great enterprise for the purpose of maintaining the Ottoman in Europe. With regard to the other matters, I think the Commission dealt very fairly with them. It attempted to lay down, and I think laid down not without success, a catalogue of those parts of the world in which India is specially interested, and of those other parts which, though to a certain extent in the neighbourhood of India, may not be considered of special interest to it. I do not think that you could make by an Act of Parliament

such a catalogue binding upon both Governments, because, in point of fact, the world does not remain at a standstill, and what might be perfectly and entirely right when Lord Welby's Commission reported may possibly, as changes in the East are not altogether unknown to us, be hereafter anything but right. Speaking generally, however, I think the Commission arrived at a very fair decision; but what I do not at all like (and I do not think the noble Earl who has just spoken held out any hope that such a course would be adopted) is the suggestion of the appointment of a permanent arbitration Commission, presided over probably by a judge of great repute, which should determine disputes between the Indian Government and the Government of this country. That, in my opinion, would simply come to this: that because we find some difficulties in doing our duty between India and this country and accommodating our disputes, therefore we are to have recourse to a system of delegating the government to some eminent judges. Now, I have a very great respect indeed for judges when they are performing duties pertaining to them, but, in my opinion, in matters political, as a rule judges are no more the best people to determine great political questions, depending on the relation between great communities, than I should be to decide a Chancery suit. That, I think, is not the least reflection on the judges; but in order to come to a fair determination on questions affecting great political issues it is essentially necessary to have had some political training. I agree also with the noble Earl that that does not by any means exclude having recourse to a system of arbitration in particular cases, and those cases may not be unfrequent. I am very glad to think that a very tiresome question, not of very great importance, but one which was hung up a great deal too long, with regard to naval expenditure, was determined by the late Prime Minister, Lord Rosebery. I am also extremely glad that so competent a man as Lord Morley was able to decide another question to which the noble Earl referred, and I do not think that these two noble Lords were at all less competent to act in those matters than the eminent judge who might preside over a tribunal, which, as it seems to me, would be something only just below the Crown itself. It would stand apparently above the Government, possibly above Parliament, indeed it would have a kind of supremacy which I look upon with considerable misgivings. It is no doubt a very simple contrivance, but I do not believe that that simple contrivance will solve the difficulties. I repeat that there are a great many questions which, instead of being left for a long time matters of warm dispute between the India Office and the Imperial Government, might be very well submitted to the arbitration of one or two sensible men who could be trusted to come to a sound decision. But whilst I have the greatest possible regard for India, and also for the great Government which so ably conducts the affairs of India, yet I hold that in the ultimate resort the Parliament of this country, led by the Cabinet of this country, must be supreme. It is upon that that must ultimately rest the decision of all matters, and in my opinion any attempt to pass by the Government of the country, and to pass by the Parliament of the country, must inevitably fail. To guard against too constant interference in Indian affairs you have provided for the Secretary of State for India a very valuable body—the Indian Council; and it has hitherto been the practice, I am happy to say, to avoid as far as possible making Indian affairs a matter of sharp political controversy in the House of Commons. I hope that that will long continue, though there must be exceptions, of course, when great questions are at issue from time to time. I should like to refer to one matter which no doubt is always one of the main matters of dispute—the amount to be paid by India for the services of Her Majesty's Army in India. Here I think also that there is some misconception. We are constantly told, and it is considered to be a most powerful argument, that India is a reserve for the Empire; but what is the fact? Is it the fact that India is a reserve for the Empire? I happened at one time to hold the office of Secretary of State for India when it seemed likely that we might be engaged in a great war beyond our frontiers. The first step we had to take was to mobilise a portion of our Reserves in this country, and we were well aware that every single man in our Reserves would have had to be sent out if that great war had eventuated. Of course the existence of that Reserve was of the very utmost importance, because by it alone should we be enabled to place a sufficient force in India when occasion arose. If the Indian Government had to maintain an additional number of troops equal to that Reserve, it would entail a very large expenditure. Indeed I may say that so far as our military force suffices for the objects in view, the whole of our Army at home—the efficient portion of it—is practically a reserve for India in the case of danger; and it is quite reasonable, it seems to me, that we should regard India also as a reserve on occasions where our interests are threatened in the far East, or it may be, for instance, in Egypt. But when you come to the question whether India shall pay for such expeditions, then I must say I should always be inclined to take what is termed a liberal view of the position of India. There are cases, I think, where India ought to bear a portion of the expenses, but I think we ought always in considering these questions to deal with India in a very liberal and generous spirit. It is a great thing for us to be able to lay our hands on those troops, and to use them when occasion requires, and I do not think we ought to be too stiff with regard to the financial question as to who is to pay for their services when they are taken out of the country. My Lords, there are a number of smaller questions upon which I will only say that I think the recommendations of the Commission are well worthy of attention. I should not like to pledge myself (although it does not very much signify what my opinion may be) to each and every one of those suggestions. They seem very valuable suggestions, and I have no doubt they will receive very careful consideration by the India Office and by Her Majesty's Government. I have very little more to add in the matter. I think that it is highly expedient that there should be no prolonged and acrimonious disputes between the Departments with regard to Indian affairs, and I am quite certain that no one will yield to myself in the strong desire always to support the authority of the Government of India, the authority of the Viceroy, and to deal with our fellow-subjects of the Indian Empire not only in a wise, but in a generous spirit, which I believe to be at the same time the sound and good policy of this country.

The Earl of Kimberley.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I do not know that I have any special reason for interposing in this debate, because, on the whole, I concur very much with the sentiments that were addressed to you by the noble Earl who has just sat down. I am glad that the India Office, under the guidance of the Commission, has been able to make pecuniary arrangements which will be satisfactory to those who have charge of the administration of India. But I entirely concur with the noble Earl opposite in repudiating the idea that India has any reason to complain of the treatment which she has received at our hands. I am very glad that this should be a generous and liberal treatment. It is very desirable not only on account of our political position, but also because the mass of the people of India are a much more struggling and suffering race than the mass of the people of this country. But I think that, with whatever qualifications in favour of liberality and generosity, we ought to look upon it as an adjustment and balancing of burdens between the taxpayers of the two countries. People talk as if this expense was Imperial, and, therefore, expense that we ought to undertake without considering whether it falls more upon us than it does upon the Indian Exchequer. That seems to me an unsound doctrine. We ought to bear the common burdens of the Empire as far as possible according to an equal and equitable rule, always remembering that we are dealing with a weaker community whose sufferings at times—and we have had recently terrible examples of it—are singularly severe; but it is a question of the British taxpayer against the Indian taxpayer, and you must observe justice between the two. There is also another—as it seems to me—fallacy in arguing this Indian question, which has been pushed too much forward, and that is that we are bound to bear a certain number of expenses on behalf of India, because, as a matter of fact, we have borne them on behalf of many of our colonies. I cannot see the cogency of that argument at all. “Is thine eye evil because I am good?” We have, partly from policy, partly from reaction on the great American conflict, and from other reasons, been exceedingly generous in our dealings with the colonies during the last fifty years, but I do not think that by that we incurred an obligation to apply precisely the same rule to every other case that came up for judgment, or that we are bound to discharge this or that claim on the part of India because we have discharged another on the part of our colonies. I would not admit that argument at all. We have to deal with the colonies on the equitable ground; and, remembering always the obligation of liberality and generosity, there is no special call for expenditure which comes upon us because we occupy an Imperial position. It is quite true that it depends on this country to make the expenditure which will defend both India and the colonies, but India does not incur the claim of allegiance as a matter of favour and consideration to us. The less there is of that quasi-sentimental language, and the more we adhere as far as circumstances permit us to do so to the strict rule of justice, the less discontent there will arise. My Lords, we have not gone very far yet into this Report, and at present really the financial burden is one that presses most upon us; but if you consider for a moment you will see how complicated and difficult the relations of India and this country in financial matters are. There is that fortress of Aden; we are told now that we are to take either the whole or the great part of the expenditure on the fortress of Aden. But, if India did not exist, of what possible use would the fortress of Aden be to the British Empire? And I must say that I think much of the expenditure which is thrown upon this country in regard to Persia is subject to the same objection—that it is for India, and for India only, that a certain class of those expenditures in Oriental countries are incurred, and therefore India ought to bear her fair share. What is now happening in the East brings home to us very much how heavy the burden of defending our position in the East may come to be, and we may have in the future to ask whether others besides this little island at this end of the world are not concerned in the maintenance of that great fabric of Chinese trade which has nourished so many parts of the Empire. I will not press into ground which is not open to us yet, but I will only urge upon those who have to deal with this question that we are not dealing with a bottomless purse when we are disposing of the resources of the British Empire. We are bound not to put on others any obligation which they cannot bear; but we may find that, without injustice to others, we cannot accept the exclusive burden which we take as part of our claim to Empire, which belongs to our British ascendancy, but which, after all, is borne not for any special advantage of our own, but because it is part of that great fabric of beneficence and of peace which it has fallen to us by the action of history to bear as the British Empire. My Lords, I only rose to say these few words, because I think there is a tendency—certainly not in the language of the noble Earl, but I think there is a tendency—to lean too much to the sentimental side and too little to what I might call the business side. “Short accounts make long friendships,” and the more perfect justice we endeavour to observe, the more we shall avoid that greatest of all calamities—any difference of opinion with our great Indian Empire.

On Question, agreed to. Return ordered accordingly.

EXECUTORS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for Second Reading read.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, this is a Bill of a legal, and therefore I think I may say of an almost entirely technical character. Its object is to remedy certain inconveniences which have been found to exist in the administration of executory estates in Scotland—to meet inconveniences arising from the fact of executors not possessing certain powers which have been conferred by statute upon trustees. The object of the Bill is to confer upon executors who derive their title directly or indirectly from a testator powers which have been conferred on gratuitous trustees by various Acts from 1861 to 1898. The Bill was drawn some years ago by a competent practitioner, and has been revised both by him and by a committee of practising lawyers. It has been generally approved by the Department over which I have the honour to preside, but up to this session it had not been found possible to give time in the other House of Parliament for its consideration. It has now passed through the other House of Parliament with the general consent of the Scottish lawyers who have seats in that assembly. It has been favourably reported upon by various legal societies in Scotland—namely, by the Society of Writers to the Signet, whose amendments have been incorporated in parts of the Bill, and also very favourably indeed by the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow. It has the approval of the Treasury on the ground that it will facilitate administrative convenience. The only particulars in which this Bill is different in structure from the Bills which have been before Parliament in former years are contained in the second clause of the Bill. The Faculty of Procurators approve of the Bill as it now stands. I think that some members of the Faculty of Advocates are not so well satisfied with the change, but I have the assurance of the present Lord Justice General that he has come to approve of the Bill in its present form, and I hope that without material change it may pass your Lordships' House. I beg to move that it be now read a second time.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

Read 3^a (according to Order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (LIABILITY OF SHIPOWNERS AND OTHERS) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3^a.—
(Lord Heneage.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY) said he was surprised that the noble Lord had moved the Third Reading, as he had received from the noble Lord the assurance—as he understood it—that the Third Reading would not be taken until Monday. He hoped, not only for the sake of this particular matter, but in the interests of the conduct of business in this House, that the motion would not be persisted in in face of the understanding to which he had alluded.

LORD HENEAGE said that as his credit, too, was at stake, he must explain that the only question raised between the noble and learned Lord and himself was whether it would be more convenient that the noble and learned Lord should move his Amendment on the Report stage yesterday or on the Third Reading to-day. The noble and learned Lord pointed out that as the Tithes Bill was down for Second Reading on Thursday it would be more convenient to take the Report stage of this Bill formally on Thursday, and that the noble and learned Lord should move his Amendment to-day. That was all that took place. If this were only a matter of convenience between the noble and learned Lord and himself he would not object to postponing the Third Reading; but there were several noble Lords present who had come down specially for this Bill, and he therefore could not take upon himself to withdraw the Bill from the purview of the House. He regretted that this misunderstanding had arisen, but in the circumstances he felt bound to press his motion for the Third Reading of the Bill.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY moved “That the debate on the said motion be adjourned.”

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY suggested that as there had clearly been a personal misunderstanding, and there was no question of the delay involving the loss of the Bill, this was not a matter upon which their Lordships should be put to the trouble of dividing, and he hoped Lord Heneage would consent to the adjournment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY joined with Lord Kimberley in suggesting that Lord Heneage should, as a matter of grace, give way.

LORD HENEAGE said that after this expression of opinion from the Leaders on both sides of the House, he felt himself at liberty to consent to the adjournment.

On Question, “That the debate on the said motion be adjourned,” resolved in the affirmative, and ordered accordingly; Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next.

MEMBERS OF LOCAL AUTHORITIES RELIEF BILL [H.L.]

Read 3^a (according to Order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD HARRIS: My Lords, as your Lordships see, this Bill amends the Housing of the Working Classes Act of 1890, and if I do not detain your Lordships at very great length upon it, I trust it will not be attributed to any want of interest in a subject of such immense and vital importance to hundreds of thousands of people living under very uncomfortable, and, I fear, very insanitary conditions in our great towns, and possibly in some cases in villages. I do not think it is necessary for me to detain you at any very great length, because I do not think there is really any serious opposition, or any opposition at all to the Bill. There may be differences of opinion as to whether the Bill might not have taken a larger scope, but so far as the Bill does go, I do not understand that there is any opposition to it. The Act of 1890 deals with three different subjects. It is divided into three parts. The first part, which refers to London chiefly, deals with unhealthy areas, provides for their clearance, and for the erection of buildings for the housing of persons who have been dishoused by the clearance of the area. The second part deals with the unhealthy dwelling houses and their destruction, and also with houses which are obstructive, which interfere with the sanitary conditions of their own neighbourhood. The third part deals with working class lodging-houses. It is with this third part, which is adoptive by the bodies which have the power of adopting it, that the Bill now before your Lordships deals. Under the third part the local authority has the power of acquiring land and erecting lodging-houses for poor people within its area, and it is in this that a difficulty has presented itself. Your Lordships know just as well or even better than I do how extremely difficult it is for a local authority in London or any large town to obtain a site within its boundaries for the erection of lodging-houses. The expense of the land is very serious, and I believe that one of the reasons that have caused this Bill to be brought forward now is that the County Council of London found themselves unable to accept an offer of a site outside their own boundary. The Bill before your Lordships will enable a local authority to go outside its own area, acquire land, and put up lodging-houses on it for the purpose of the inhabitants of the area which it governs. That is what is dealt with under the first clause of the Bill, and I think I am justified in saying that it is the most important in the Bill. That applies to any council other than a rural district council which has adopted Part III. of the Act of 1890. Clause 2 deals with the rural district council, and the difficulty that has been met with there is not of the same character. The difficulty there is in the matter of procedure. Under the present law a rural district council has to obtain the approval of the county council by a laborious process. The county council has to appoint a committee, and has to inquire very closely in detail upon the spot, and altogether it has been found that that process is so laborious that the district councils have been discouraged from adopting that part of the Act. Clause 2 of the Bill before your Lordships simplifies that procedure. The consent of the county council is still necessary, but it will not be necessary for that county council to go through the same process that it had to take under the present Act. Sub-section 2 provides—

“(2) In giving or withholding their consent under this section, the county council shall have regard—

- (a) To the area for which it is proposed to adopt the said Part; and
- (b) To the necessity for accommodation for the housing of the working classes in that area; and
- (c) To the probability of such accommodation being provided without the adoption of the said Part; and
- (d) To the liability which will be incurred by the rates, and to the question whether it is, under all the circumstances, prudent for the district council to adopt the said Part.”

The 3rd Clause of the Bill will enable the new Metropolitan Borough Councils to adopt Part III. as amended, and to exercise powers under the Act as amended for the acquirement of land and the putting up of houses for the purpose. Then, my Lords, at present the law insists upon expenditure upon one part of the Bill being accounted for under that part. Clause 4 of this Bill will enable the local authority to account for expenditure under Part III. under any one of the other parts. For instance, if an area has been cleared under Part I., and if a site for lodging-houses has been acquired under Part III., and a profit can be made by the scheme under Part III., that profit may be set against the expenditure under Part I. The only condition is that there shall be a separate account. Then, under Clause 5—

“(1) The local authority, if not a rural district council, with the consent of the Local Government Board, and if a rural district council with the consent of the county council, may lease any land acquired by them under and for the purposes of Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (in this section referred to as ‘the Act,’) to any lessee for the purpose and under the condition that the lessee will carry the Act into execution by building and maintaining on the land lodging-houses within the meaning of the Act.”

That was an Amendment put in during the course of the Bill through the House of Commons with a very practical argument behind it that it might very possibly be that some person perfectly competent and anxious to do work of this kind might be very much better able to do it than the county council itself, and therefore this provision has been made, that the local authority, with the consent of certain higher authority, may for the purpose of carrying out the intention lease the land. Sections 61 and 62 of the Act will not extend to any lodging-house to which this Act applies. For this reason: that those sections refer to the local authority where the land has been acquired—that is to say, the land outside the area administered by the local authority which has acquired it. Let us take the case of the London County Council. If they had acquired some land outside their own area they naturally would not want the local authority in that area to manage their lodging-houses for them. The intention is to retain the management of those lodging-houses in the hands of the authority that has acquired the area. Under Clause 6, on the complaint of a parish council where a district council has, in the opinion of the parish council, failed to adopt the Act when it ought to have adopted it, or failed to carry out a scheme which might in the opinion of the parish council have been advantageously carried out, the county council is empowered to examine into the arguments

pro and con., and, if it thinks right, to take over the powers of the rural district council, and to adopt the Act with regard to that particular scheme. Under Clause 7 a cheaper form of arbitration is provided for, whereby a single arbitrator will be called in instead of, as has been the practice, two arbitrators with an umpire in case of disagreement. These, my Lords, are the general provisions of the Bill. The main objections that have been taken to it are as follows: It has been objected that the Bill does not contain provisions for securing convenient railway and tramway facilities. It was thought by some Members of the House of Commons who I am sure have a very wide knowledge of the conditions under which people live in these very crowded areas, that this Bill should have taken a wider scope and should have provided for, I think I may say, the compulsion of railway companies to run convenient workmen's trains to these areas before the lodging-houses were built. Well, in the opinion of the Government, the powers of the President of the Board of Trade are already sufficient to secure that convenient workmen's trains shall be run to these areas when there is some indication that there will be a population there requiring those trains. That is so far as trains are concerned. With regard to tramways I understand the difficulty to be this: that a local authority wishing to project a tramway not only through its own area, but through the area of, we will say, a neighbouring local authority, is unable to obtain the ear of Parliament because the local authority which intervenes or is outside the particular area, if it objects, can prevent the first local authority approaching Parliament at all. A deputation waited upon Mr. Chaplin, the President of the Local Government Board, and Mr. Ritchie, the President of the Board of Trade, with the object of placing before them their views upon this particular point. Having considered very attentively the representations put forward by that deputation, I believe the intention of the Government—I do not know that I am authorised to say that they intend to do it, but I am sure that I am authorised in saying that they are considering most sympathetically the proposal to omit the present Standing Order No. 22, with a view to insert a new Standing Order providing that where a local authority desires to run a tramway through the area of another local authority, the first local authority shall be entitled to be heard by Parliament. I understand the difficulty at present is that they are debarred from being heard before Parliament in such a case if an objection is raised by a neighbouring local authority. If the Standing Orders are amended as suggested then the local authority desiring to project the tramway will, at any rate, be heard by Parliament, and I am given to understand that the members of the Government who have given their consideration to this are prepared to support it. I do not know whether it has at present come before the Chairman of Committees in this House, but I believe it has come before the similar authority in the other House, and has been approved there. Those are two of the objections that have been raised to the Bill. Another objection is that the Bill ought to have provided for the power of a local authority to hire land outside its own area. That the Government have opposed—I personally think upon thoroughly sound grounds. I can imagine most serious injustice being done to very deserving people and people who are by no means in very affluent circumstances. If such a power did exist one can conceive this—I do not say injustice, because it would be the law, but I think it would be rather unfair—that a man having invested his fortune in a piece of land would be under the risk of its being acquired by a local authority and his not receiving even the purchase price of the land, but only such an amount of rent (in perpetuity, I believe, is the intention) as somebody or other—not the local authority, I presume, but some arbitrator—might decide was at that date the value of the land. How the individual would ever re-acquire the real estate I am not sure. However, there was a proposal in some such form as that which the Government opposed in the other House, and it was not pressed. My Lords, the general complaint in the other House was that the Bill was not of a large enough scope, that it might have been a very much more heroic measure altogether. Well, there is a different opinion, which is that in this matter—an extremely difficulty one, affecting the rights of property—it is on the whole better to go slow than to take a very long time poring and arguing over the merits or demerits of a large measure, and perhaps in the end not producing out of the argument anything very valuable. At any rate, if this is not a very long step in advance, I honestly believe that it will be a useful one. It endeavours to remedy at any rate one serious difficulty, the difficulty which the local authority has in obtaining land at a moderate price. There is one other objection, I remember, which was raised, and that is that the Bill did not contain any provision for the length of time within which a loan obtained by a local authority for acquiring land should be repaid. The suggestion was that the term of sixty years should be extended to seventy, or even up to 100 years. That was resisted by the Government in the other House on the ground that it is impossible to say now what may be the demand for houses sixty years hence or longer, and that sixty years is a sufficient period during which it is safe to allow these loans to be repaid. My Lords, as I say, the Bill does not profess to be a great scheme. It follows on the lines of those Bills that have been at various times introduced, and which were consolidated in the Bill of my noble friend the noble Viscount behind me (Viscount Cross) in 1890. It endeavours to meet a distinct difficulty which has been experienced by the County Council of London amongst others, and I think your Lordships will see for yourselves that if the Bill, when it becomes law, is as effective as the Government believes it can be made to be, it does solve one of the most difficult problems which we have to face in the case of these overcrowded areas—that the local authority can take the people concerned out of a crowded area into one in which the sanitary conditions are far better. Those are the main reasons with which the Bill has been introduced. It has, on the whole, I think, been received by thoughtful people even on the other side of the House in the House of Commons with approval, although I admit that there have been these criticisms; but as a whole it has been received with approval, having regard to the divisions and the speeches. I have read every speech that has been made in the other House, and I think I am perfectly justified in saying that the Bill has been received with approval there where it has been debated at considerable length, and I hope it may receive the same approval from your Lordships.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Harris.)

EARL CARRINGTON: My Lords, the great interest that has been taken in this Bill and in the question of the housing of the working classes generally must be my excuse for troubling your Lordships with a few words upon this motion, first as a member of the Housing Committee of the London County Council, and also as an elected Member for St. Pancras, which is one of the most congested parts of the whole of congested London. I have listened with great attention to the very lucid speech of the noble Lord who moved the Second Reading. With two points brought forward by him I entirely agree. He says this is not a great scheme. Indeed it is not. He also says that there will be no opposition. Naturally there will be no opposition from this side of the House, or, at any rate, there there will be no opposition from the Liberal party, but I am bound to say that the scheme has been received by the whole Liberal party with very great and grievous disappointment. The noble Lord did not say much about the circumstances that led up to this Bill being brought forward. I will for one moment refer to them, and if I say anything that is not the fact there is Lord Cross, who has the whole thing at his fingers' ends, and he will correct me if I fall into any error. From 1851, when Lord Shaftesbury's two Acts were passed, up to 1870, there was no desire on the part of municipalities to take action in this matter of the housing of the poor. Then the noble Viscount opposite brought in his Acts of 1876, 1879 and 1882, and those, with Mr. Torrens' Acts of 1866 and 1868, produced a little improvement; but I think I am only speaking the absolute truth when I say that mainly owing to the expensive machinery required to put those various Acts into motion the activity that was shown was short lived and spasmodic. Then in 1884 the noble Marquess (Lord Salisbury) moved for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole subject. We sat for two years and issued a unanimous Report. I cannot say that there was anything very—to use the noble Lord's language—heroic in that Report, but it had the effect of leading to the Bill of 1885, which was put forward by the noble Marquess, and on the Report of this Commission I think I may fairly say that the consolidation and amendment of the foregoing Acts with Lord Salisbury's Act of 1885 were effected by the Housing of the Working Classes Act of 1890, which simplified and cheapened the machinery involved in municipal action. In 1889 the Conservative Government created the London County Council, and the Metropolitan Board of Works ceased to exist. The Metropolitan Board of Works, as the House well knows, used to clear away insanitary areas and sell land to building companies, and I believe during the whole of its existence it housed a little more than 27,000 persons up to the year 1889, when it ceased to exist. The London County Council then came into operation, and they began to build themselves in 1892, and in eight years we have housed 10,000 persons. What we have in hand now and what we have completed in the last sixteen months amounts to an additional accommodation for 25,000 more people, at a cost of £1,500,000, and we confidently expect that schemes that we are considering will enable us to house an additional 24,500 persons, making a grand total of 60,000 persons rehoused within the next five years. But, after all, we have been told that this is only touching the fringe of the question. That I admit, but I say that we could have done a great deal better, and we could have really—if I may be permitted to use the expression in this House—tackled the question in sober earnest, had we had greater facilities for housing the working classes. The noble Lord opposite said there were very few objections that had been made to this Bill in the House of Commons, and he mentioned some of them, but I venture to think that he forgot some of the most important ones. There are five propositions of what is really wanted for housing the poor in urban districts. First of all, the period within which loans for building purposes must be repaid, should be considerably extended. As the noble Lord said, it is now up to sixty years, and we ask as a matter of justice that it should be extended to 100 years. If noble Lords would be kind enough to go round to the Millbank site, and see the building being put up there by the London County Council for the housing of the working classes, they will,

I am perfectly certain, agree that it is absolutely preposterous to imagine that those buildings will not last 100 years. Then the next thing we want is the compulsory registration of the real owners of all property, so that those benefiting from insanitary slums and illegal overcrowdings could be immediately and drastically dealt with. Your Lordships know that the Land Transfer Act of 1897 is not compulsory, except in a few parts of London. The third thing we require is power to the local authority to have destroyed without compensation, and at the cost of the owner, insanitary slums which are injurious to health, where the owners fail to make them really habitable after being called upon to do so, and if then the owner refuses to rebuild, the local body should have the power to do so on equitable terms. Fourthly, we want power given to the local authorities—this point was mentioned by the noble Lord—to insist on a much better transit service to and from the suburbs of the great towns. At present the cheap transit follows the peopling of a new district. If overcrowding is to be really prevented, cheap transit must be used largely in the development of new districts, and must not be left merely to follow their development. Then, fifthly, what we have always asked for, and what this Bill no doubt gives, is that local governing bodies in our great towns should be empowered to acquire land compulsorily outside their own jurisdiction for the erection of workmen's dwellings. The Bill on the Table gives us this last concession, but it refuses to entertain the other points which we consider so essential to the welfare of the community at large. I have spoken of the disappointment with which this Bill is received by the party to which I have the honour to belong, and I maintain that we have cause to complain that so little has been done for the working classes only at the end of five years by this all-powerful Government to try to put an end to a condition of things which is a danger to the State and a disgrace and a stain to our civilisation and our Christianity.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): I only wanted to call attention to one or two points mentioned by the noble Lord behind me, but I cannot help being rather amused at hearing my noble friend opposite, as a representative of the Liberal party, talking of their disappointment at the character of this Bill. As far as I know, the whole legislation relating to the curing of these formidable evils, which I fully admit, was carried out by my noble friends behind me; and during the time that the noble Lord opposite and the Liberal party were in office, I am not aware that they did anything towards carrying into the Statute-book any of those reforms that my noble friend has enumerated just now. It is rather amusing, therefore, now to hear my noble friend expressing bitter disappointment at the small nature of this Bill. However, my Lords, that is neither here nor there—it is by the way. I did want to say one word about a matter that was referred to by my noble friend in moving the Second Reading of the Bill—namely, the question of the consent of local authorities to tramways running through their district from another district. As the House is aware, at present under the Standing Orders of the House the consent of any local authority, or, if the local authority differs from the road authority, the road authority as well, is necessary as a preliminary to the introduction of any Bill. It is what is called an Examiner's Standing Order, and unless the consent of the authority is proved before the Examiner it is impossible for the Bill to come before Parliament at all. Now, I entirely sympathise with the views of my noble friend who has moved the Second Reading of the Bill, and I think they to a great extent fall in with the views of my noble friend opposite. I am strongly of opinion that the local authorities ought to have a very strong voice when tramways are put through their district by persons, either companies or municipalities, outside those districts; but, beyond giving them a mandatory power of being heard before Committees, I venture to think it would be desirable (and I should be very glad, if certain circumstances arise, to move an Amendment in the Standing Orders to that effect) to take away from authorities the absolute power of stopping schemes of this kind. That is the main point to which I wanted to call attention; but I confess that I am very glad to hear from my noble friend that the Government do not look with any favour upon the idea of compulsory hiring in matters of this kind. I think this question of compulsory hiring, which has cropped up in several directions, at present is not a very safe one. If local authorities or companies for public purposes require land, surely they ought to take the land with all its liabilities and obligations upon it, and allow the owner to be absolutely free. I think this question of compulsory hiring is a most dangerous one, and that it will act very unfairly and with great hardship upon owners of land. There is a very important question raised by the noble Lord opposite as to the length of term during which loans for various objects should be repaid by local authorities. I do not like to dogmatise at all on such a question. I quite see the importance that it is to local authorities to get those terms prolonged, but still it ought to be done with very great caution. At present the maximum term is sixty years—that is, two generations; and I think we ought to have very strong arguments before we extend the term very much beyond that. One hardly knows what changes may take place in the surroundings of any undertaking or any scheme in the course of two generations. As I said, I am not prepared to dogmatise on the subject, but I confess that at present very strong arguments should be brought forward to induce Parliament to assent to extending the time beyond the sixty years or two generations that has thus far prevailed.

VISCOUNT CROSS: I should not have intervened in this debate if it had not been for the reference made to myself personally by the noble Lord opposite. He has given a fairly accurate account of the history of this particular kind of legislation, and it is a great satisfaction to me to find that public opinion has grown very much upon this subject, especially of late years. It was in the year 1875 when I had the honour of bringing forward a Bill to enable the authorities in London to get rid of what you may call the unhealthy areas; and if anybody remembers what unhealthy areas there were in London at that time, and were to go to those places and see the fine buildings erected now for the lodging of the labouring classes in their place, he would be perfectly amazed at the change that has taken place. I do not believe that there is one of these unhealthy areas

now existing in London which it was the special object of the Bill of 1875 to remove. But so difficult was it at that time to pass a Bill of that kind that I remember very well when I laid the instructions before the noble Lord, Lord Thring, who was then the Parliamentary draughtsman, to draw that Bill he came to me and positively refused to carry out my instructions. I inquired why. He said, "I can only characterise your Bill, Mr. Cross, in two words—Communism and Confiscation." Well, I do not think there is much confiscation if you look at the amount of money which the City of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works had to pay in order to carry out the Act; while as to Communism, if by communism is meant doing what you can to house the working classes in fit and decent places, not at the expense of the State, but to enable them to house themselves in decent houses, then I am quite willing to be called a Communist. But it was not till I drew the Preamble of that Act of 1875 that the noble Lord would consent to draw the clauses which were to give effect to it. Public opinion has changed very considerably since then. That Act of 1875 is now embodied in the Act of 1890. The noble Lord opposite has complained that the present Bill does not go quite far enough. At all events, it does make a very substantial step in the right direction. It will enable local authorities, where it is almost impossible for them to obtain land within their area, to obtain equally good land for the housing of the working classes outside the area. If it did no more than that it would have done a great deal. It will, I believe, promote the building of houses for the working classes, and I sincerely hope your Lordships will not only give the Bill a Second Reading but will carry it through as it is. I am bound to say I quite agree with what has fallen from the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees. I do not think that the time of borrowing ought to be extended too much. Sixty years, as the noble Earl has said, covers two generations. At all events, if the present generation is not to bear its own burdens, do not go beyond the next generation. If you come to 100 years you come to the third and fourth generations, who will have burdens of their own to bear independently of those which you want to place upon them. Therefore I for one ld be certainly opposed to an enlargement of the time during which the money be repaid. My Lords, I believe this is a substantial contribution to what all want to see, and I heartily support Second Reading.

ORD WINDSOR: I wanted to ask question upon the Bill and its relation the Housing of the Working Classes, 1890. In the first place we are all ed that this is not a very large me; but I think that the noble Lord moved the Second Reading of this is justified in saying that it a step in the right direction, and two grounds particularly I ld be inclined to support it. One at I think the ratepayers have a right ome relief. We all know the difficulty in rehousing the working classes in very centre of the huge population of don. Only a few hours ago in a mittee Room upstairs a member of London County Council was giving ence, and he stated that a site had acquired at the cost of £200,000, that with the condition upon it of ting workmen's dwelling-houses it was ed at £45,000; that is, that the commercial value of the land had been reduced per cent. at least in consideration of condition attached as to the erection workmen's dwelling-houses upon it. act, he gave us instances more striking, that that. Another one that I may tion was an instance of a site that been acquired and had been put up uction, and not one single bid of one le penny-piece did they get from anyone this land, because of the condition hed to it. Therefore, I say that I think it is desirable for the sake of ratepayers that larger powers should given to acquire land outside the area, at the London County Council, for nce, can make greater use of the ers which I believe they already have; is of, in certain cases, selling land n they have taken away the old es—selling the land at its commercial e, and buying other more suitable for the erection of dwelling-houses. Lords, it is not possible, it is not to xpected, that exactly the same persons are displaced can be immediately ed in new dwellings. We had an nce of that mentioned in evidence afternoon before the Committee to h I have referred. A witness for the London County Council told us that on a certain site where tenants had been displaced new buildings were erected, and a certain number of the old tenants applied for these new buildings, but their behaviour has been such that it has been absolutely impossible to keep them; no respectable person would take lodgings under the same roof with them, because they were not amenable to any proper discipline, and such discipline as is absolutely necessary for persons living together in the same building. So that we do not suppose that these persons will be immediately housed, but it certainly will have a tendency to remove the congestion if these dwellings are built on outside areas. The persons who occupy them must at any rate have lived somewhere before—they will have left their own houses and left them empty, or if the houses had been overcrowded before it will have a tendency to remove the congestion. Therefore, I think the noble Lord is perfectly justified in saying that it is a step in the right direction. My Lords, I wanted to ask what relation has this Bill, under Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, which is mentioned over and over again, with Part I. of that same Act. In Clause 12, Sub-section 3, Part I. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, I read that—

“The local authority may also engage with any body of trustees, society, or person, to carry the whole or any part of such scheme into effect upon such terms as the local authority may think expedient, but the local authority shall not themselves, without the express approval of the confirming authority, undertake the rebuilding of the houses.”

Then in Sub-section 5—

“If the local authority erect any dwellings out of funds to be provided under this part of the Act, they shall, unless the confirming authority otherwise determine, sell and dispose of all such dwellings within ten years from the time of the completion thereof.”

Then, turning to Part III., Clause 59—

“The local authority may, on any land acquired or appropriated by them, erect any buildings suitable for lodging-houses.”

And further on, Clause 61 says—

“The general management, regulation, and control of the lodging-houses established or acquired by a local authority under this part of this Act shall be vested in and exercised by the local authority.”

LORD HARRIS: That is cut out in this Bill.

LORD WINDSOR: Then I presume it would mean that they are not to rebuild houses other than lodging-houses.

LORD HARRIS: My noble friend opposite, Lord Carrington, knows better than I do, but I think the explanation is that the houses referred to in Part I. are not lodging-houses. It is only Part III. that deals with lodging-houses, and if a local authority builds houses on the area that has been cleared they need not be necessarily lodging-houses; they may be probably houses of any kind or description.

EARL CARRINGTON: Under, I think, the 13th Clause of Lord Salisbury's Act the noble Lord will find in the definition that "lodging-house" means any house or tenement of any sort or description that is erected for the occupation of the poor. "Lodging-house" does not mean a house kept for lodgers to live in, but it includes every sort of house, whether two families live in it or one, that is erected for the occupation of the poor. I think that is the definition of "lodging-house" in the Act of 1890.

On Question, agreed to.

Copies presented, of Diplomatic and Consular Reports, Annual Series, Nos. 2479 to 2483 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

ARMY (SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE, 1900-1901).

Estimate presented, of the Further Amount which will be required in the year ending 31st March, 1901, to meet the Additional Expenditure, mainly due to the War in South Africa, Affairs in China, and for increased reserves of Stores [by Command]; Referred to the Committee of Supply, and to be printed. [No. 290.]

ARMY (ORDNANCE FACTORIES) (ESTIMATE, 1900-1901).

Copy presented, of Revised Estimate of Charge for the year 1900-1901 [by Command]; Referred to the Committee of Supply, and to be printed. [No. 291.]

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—INCREASE OF BRITISH FORCES.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the grave situation in China, he will give the House full details of the considerable reinforcements of men and ships which he stated were on their way to China, in addition to the increases previously announced; and whether Her Majesty's Government have decided to further augment our naval and military forces in the Far East for the protection of the lives and property of British subjects.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BROD-

RICK, Surrey, Guildford): The reinforcements in ships which have been sent out to China since the present outbreak consist of: "Goliath," battleship; "Argonaut," "Isis," "Dido," "Marathon," "Wallaroo," "Arethusa," and "Mohawk," cruisers; "Lizard," "Bramble," and "Britomart," gunboats; besides 860 seamen and marines by transport. The despatch of reinforcements will naturally depend upon the course of events. Ten thousand men have been despatched from India, and the troops withdrawn from Hong Kong are being made up. Further troops have been placed under orders in India, and can be immediately despatched if necessity arises. Troops will be available in this country to replace any troops withdrawn.

PROHIBITION OF EXPORTATION OF ARMS.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have taken any steps to prevent the exportation of arms or munitions of war to China by British firms; and, if not, whether immediate steps will be taken.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): As the hon. Member knows, it is impossible in the present state of the law to forbid the importation of munitions of war into China from this country; but the matter seems to the Government to be extremely pressing, and to-day a Bill will be introduced in the House of Lords conferring the necessary powers.

CONSUL GENERAL WARREN.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the fact that Mr. Warren, the Acting British Consul General at Shanghai, is now the senior representative of British interests in China, and possesses such knowledge of Chinese affairs as will enable him to deal with the Viceroys in the present crisis, the Government are prepared to give him temporary rank as Chargé d'Affaires.

MR. BRODRICK: Full powers to take all necessary action have been given to Consul General Warren, but it is not considered desirable in the present state of affairs to make the change suggested by the hon. Member.

YANG-TSZE VALLEY—BRITISH PRECAUTIONS.

MR. YERBURGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government are aware that a strong opinion has been expressed at Shanghai that a powerful body of British troops together with transports should be held in readiness at Hong Kong for immediate despatch to the Yang-tze Valley in case of necessity; and can he state what are the number of troops now at Hong Kong available for such service, and whether they are provided with sufficient transports.

MR. BRODRICK: The Government are aware that strong views are held at Shanghai and other Yang-tze ports as to the desirability of sending ships and troops for the protection of Europeans, but there is not unanimity of opinion as to the effect of such action. Troops are now rapidly arriving from India. The officers commanding the troops at Hong Kong and Wei-hai-wei have been directed to place themselves in direct communication with the Consul General at Shanghai with a view of meeting any emergency.

MR. YERBURGH: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of my question, as to the number of troops available and the supply of transports.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Will the Government consider the alternative of withdrawing all British subjects in this region to Hong Kong?

[No answer was given.]

REPORTED MASSACRE OF MISSIONARIES IN SHAN-SI.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk Burghs): I wish to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the statement is true, which has appeared in one paper, that sixty missionaries have been massacred in Shan-si.

MR. BRODRICK: I have seen the statement which appeared in one paper, but Her Majesty's Government have no confirmation of it, and we are in hopes that it may not be correct.

BRITISH NAVAL FORCE ON THE YANG-TSZE RIVER.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON: I wish to ask whether the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs can state the number and class of ships on the Yang-tze River?

*MR. BRODRICK: Sixteen of Her Majesty's ships are at present employed on the Yang-tze and its vicinity, and are being moved from day to day to meet the constantly changing conditions. The senior naval officer is at Woosung, and is in close communication with the Consul General at Shanghai. It is not desirable that the exact positions of Her Majesty's ships on the China Station should be specified during the present critical condition of affairs.

BRITISH TROOPS IN INDIA.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state what number of the 22,000 troops at present drawn from the India establishment for foreign service are British troops and what will be the number of British troops in India subject to these deductions.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The number of British troops at present withdrawn from the Indian establishment for foreign service is about 8,600. The actual number of British troops in India, allowing for these deductions, is about 61,000.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—SUPPOSED PLEDGE OF SECRECY IMPOSED ON CIVIL SURGEONS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for War a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether it is a fact, as stated by the hon. Member for Westminster in the daily press, that civil surgeons employed in military hospitals in South Africa have been required by the Army Medical Department to sign a contract not to divulge in any way what their impressions may be on hospital matters.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): Civil surgeons have to sign a contract—not being enrolled or amenable to discipline under the Army Act—accepting the terms offered and the obligation of discipline therein set out. I have in my hand a copy of the contract. The only paragraphs that bear upon discipline are as follows—

"During the said period I will devote my whole time and professional skill to my service hereunder, and will obey all orders given to me by commissioned military or naval officers, or by the permanent medical officers of either of those services."

And the next paragraph runs—

"In case I shall complete my service hereunder to your satisfaction in all respects, I shall receive at the end of the said period a gratuity of two months full pay at the rate hereinbefore specified; but in case I shall in any manner misconduct myself, or shall be (otherwise than through illness or unavoidable accident) unfit in any respect for service hereunder, of which misconduct or unfitness you shall be sole judge, you shall be at liberty from and immediately after such misconduct or unfitness to discharge me from further service hereunder, and thereupon all pay and allowances hereunder shall cease, and I shall not be entitled to any free passage home or gratuity."

That is the only contract civil surgeons have to sign, and for my part I cannot discover any foundation for the statement in question.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): Arising out of the answer of the hon. Member, I desire to ask him a question which contains a correction of detail, but adds I think very largely to the force and significance of the statement to which the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire refers. It is this—whether it is not the case that after some letters had been published from doctors in South African hospitals they had to sign a declaration to the effect that they were not to communicate their impressions of hospital matters to the public, or that they were to take the consequences?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have no knowledge to any such effect. The contract I have read is the only contract we have, and I am unaware of any other contract whatever.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): On that point it may be desirable to communicate by telegraph with South Africa as to whether this declaration exists or was enforced.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no objection whatever.

BATTLE OF THE TUGELA—COL. LONG AND SIR REDVERS BULLER — DESPATCHES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state why the explanation of Colonel Long, R.A., with reference to the circumstances under which the guns were lost at the battle of the Tugela, has been withheld from the public, having regard to the fact that Sir Redvers Buller in his despatch or communication with reference to the capture of these guns, while throwing on Colonel Long the responsibility of the mishap, stated that he was too ill at the time to give any explanation; and whether, in justice to Colonel Long, who has been censured without having been heard in his defence, Colonel Long's statement, which has been for a considerable time in the possession of the authorities, will be immediately published.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that it is not the practice to publish communications of the kind to which the hon. Member refers.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Sir Redvers Buller said that Colonel Long had no opportunity to give his own account of the transaction? Now that the account has been given, why not publish it in justice to Colonel Long?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Because it is not usual to publish documents of that kind. I do not know why the rule should be departed from in this case.

SOUTH AFRICAN BLUE-BOOK.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can say whether any steps were taken with a view to substantiate the statements contained in letters addressed to the Times of Natal and the Natal Mercury by private individuals previous to their insertion in the Blue-book on South African affairs just issued; and whether it is customary to publish uncorroborated newspaper correspondence in Blue-books.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): There is nothing unusual in the publication of newspaper

correspondence. The first letter is corroborated by Sir R. Buller's telegram published at page 154; the second by a declaration by Mr. Kennard, made before the Resident Commissioner of Basutoland.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Do not the statements appearing in South African papers require confirmation, in view of the fact that South Africa has earned for itself the title of the "land of lies"?

BOER TREATMENT OF PRISONERS AT PRETORIA.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has received any report from Lord Roberts since the release of the prisoners of war at Pretoria as to the treatment accorded to them during their confinement; if he has, what is the purport of it, and when the despatches on the subject will be laid upon the Table of the House.

MR. WYNDHAM: No such report has been received from Lord Roberts.

REINFORCEMENTS—STATISTICS.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state the number of troops sent to South Africa since 5th June.

MR. WYNDHAM: 12,203 officers and men.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: How many were Regulars?

MR. WYNDHAM: All, I think; but I cannot pledge myself to that.

BOER WOMEN SENT BACK TO ENEMY'S LINES.

MR. C. P. SCOTT (Lancashire, Leigh): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a proclamation has been issued at Pretoria under which such women as are believed to be the wives of men who are fighting against us are to be driven into the enemy's lines; whether among these women are any who have been rendered destitute through the burning of their farms and crops; and whether the proclamation will be enforced against children as well as women.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No intimation to this effect has been received at the War Office.

RESERVE MEDICAL OFFICERS—PROMOTION REGULATIONS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether paragraph 670, Royal Warrant for Pay and Promotion, which provides that Army Reserve officers shall during their employment on Army service be eligible for promotion, applies to Army medical officers; and if this paragraph does not apply to these officers, what are the grounds of their exclusion from its benefits.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The article in question applies to Army medical officers.

CAMDEN FORT (CORK) GUN FATALITY.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the inquest held on the 15th instant upon the body of Gunner John Addis, of the South Cork Artillery Militia, who was killed on Monday by the bursting of the breech of a 40-pounder gun at Camden Fort, county Cork; whether the gun was one of four that were injured before, whether it was an out-of-date pattern and had been condemned, and whether he can state what precautions are taken to test guns before artillery practice is entered upon; and whether, in view of the circumstances of the case, the War Office will duly compensate the relatives of the deceased gunner, and also the other gunners who were wounded, one of them dangerously, upon that occasion.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The matter referred to by the hon. Member will be inquired into.

MR. FLYNN: How soon shall we know the result?

*MR. WYNDHAM: We have had one report, but it is considered necessary to have an expert opinion on the gun. I anticipate receiving that report at no distant date.

MR. FLYNN: I will put another question down.

2ND KENT ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS—EASTER CAMP ALLOWANCE.

SIR FRANCIS EVANS (Southampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the War Office, by a letter written early this month, informed the officer commanding the 2nd Kent Volunteer Artillery that the allowances paid for the Easter camp would be deducted at the settlement of the special camp accounts; and whether, in view of the charges which would thereby be thrown upon the corps should they attend the special camp, he could see his way to forego the deduction of the Easter camp charge, amounting to over £400, and so enable this corps, which is up to its full strength, to attend the special camp.

*MR. WYNDHAM: As the corps was specially required in connection with a scheme of mobilisation, the Secretary of State for War has sanctioned the issue of allowances for the Easter camp.

RIFLE CLUBS—GOVERNMENT ALLOWANCES.

MR. GODDARD (Ipswich): On behalf of the hon. Member for Mid Norfolk, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Government is prepared to facilitate the formation and success of rifle clubs by allowing fifty rounds of ammunition per man free, by granting the free use of Government ranges when not required by the Army and Reserve forces, by supplying condemned Lee-Enfield rifles for Morris tube practice, and by issuing Lee-Enfield service rifles in the proportion of one to every ten members without charge to the club.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Government will allow to authorised rifle clubs ammunition at cost price up to 100 rounds per member, and Lee-Enfield rifles at cost price in the proportion of one for every ten members. The question of Morris tube rifles has not been raised by the National Rifle Association, through which the War Office is dealing with these clubs. The question of the terms on which the use of Government ranges can be given is under consideration.

SOUTH DENES (YARMOUTH) CAMP—SISTERS OF NAZARETH.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he is aware of the fact that the only application made to visit the Camp, South Denes, Yarmouth, was that made by the Sisters of Nazareth, highly commended in South Africa; and what explanation has been given by Colonel Commanding Brownrigg for their being turned away from the camp now containing 1,000 Roman Catholic Volunteers.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am prepared to inquire into this matter.

DR. TANNER: Is the hon. Gentleman aware there are 1,000 Catholic troops in this camp, and that no objection was offered by the men to the visits of these sisters?

[No answer was given.]

VOLUNTEER ENGINEER CORPS FOR SOUTH EAST LANCASHIRE.

SIR J. W. MACLURE (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, seeing that a communication was received by the War Office on or about the 18th May, inquiring whether sanction would be given for the formation of a Volunteer Corps of Engineers in South East Lancashire, including Manchester, Salford, and neighbouring towns, and that the assurance was given that over 1,000 men connected with the engineering and allied trades had promised to join and to conform with the Volunteer Regulations Act, whether any definite reply has been given; and, if not, can he state whether the necessary sanction and consent of the War Office will be granted for the formation of the proposed corps if all the necessary conditions and requirements are properly undertaken.

MR. WYNDHAM: The question is under the consideration of the general officer commanding North Western District, with whom the persons proposing to raise the corps have been requested to correspond.

SENIOR NAVAL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY—OFFICIAL RESIDENCE.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: On behalf of the noble Lord the Member for Roxburgh (Earl of DALKEITH), I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the importance of the First

Sea Lord living at the Admiralty in order to enable him to deal with urgent matters of pressing necessity that arise after office hours, Her Majesty's Government have considered the necessity for providing a residence for him in the Admiralty buildings, or adjacent to them; and, if not, will they undertake to consider it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Government have under consideration a plan for meeting the demand for a residence for the Senior Naval Lord in the vicinity of the Admiralty, and it is hoped that it may be brought to a successful conclusion.

NAVAL EMERGENCY COAL CONTRACTS.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty, if he will state why coal was taken under emergency contracts for the Naval manœuvres in 1888, and why none has been taken since; whether the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, as sole judges of the circumstances constituting anticipated or actual war under which contractors shall be called upon to supply on emergency contracts, have decided that the military operations in South Africa and in China are not circumstances such as would constitute actual or anticipated war; and if it be the intention of the Admiralty not to carry out their emergency contracts when the state of the coal market enables them to do better without them, will he in future see that this is notified to the contractors before the contracts are entered into.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, N.): Coals for the manœuvres were included in the emergency contracts until 1899. Since then they have been brought under separate contracts, that being, in the opinion of the Admiralty, the preferable course. It has not been considered necessary to come to any such decision as that indicated in the hon. Member's question, coal for China and South Africa being provided for in the ordinary way. With regard to the last paragraph, the question of what notification shall be given to contractors is being considered.

BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA—CHIROMO AND LAKE NYASSA RAILWAY.

*SIR BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, if it be impossible to assist the British Central African Protectorate with a direct grant, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to guarantee a loan for the construction of a railway from Chiromo to Lake Nyassa.

*MR. BRODRICK: Her Majesty's Government are not prepared at present to undertake such a railway, or to guarantee a loan for its construction.

MAURITIUS—BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA RIFLES.

*SIR BRAMPTON GURDON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state when the Papers with reference to the disturbances in connection with the British Central Africa Rifles, when quartered in Mauritius, will be laid before the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is not proposed to lay any Papers on this subject before Parliament.

*SIR BRAMPTON GURDON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that I have had letters from Lord Selborne and the Under Secretary of State for War promising that these Papers should be laid on the Table?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir; I was not aware of that.

*SIR BRAMPTON GURDON: Will the right hon. Gentleman verify my statement? I do not expect him to believe it on my word.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Of course I entirely accept the statement of the hon. Member, and I will make inquiries into the subject. But the matter has been further considered; and I am not prepared to say now that I will produce Papers on the subject. I do not think it would be in the public interest that I should do so.

AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH—GOVERNOR GENERAL'S RESIDENCE.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it has been decided to swear the Governor General in at Sydney, and to inaugurate the Australian Commonwealth in that city; whether Sydney will also be the official residence of the Governor General until the establishment of the permanent Federal capital; and whether the inconveniences likely to arise from the Governor General residing in Sydney, while the Federal Parliament has to meet in Melbourne, have been taken into consideration.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The answer to the first part of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. The Government of New South Wales has been informed that if the other colonies agree, Her Majesty's Government will not object to the Governor General residing at Sydney while the Federal Parliament is not sitting, but that the matter must be subject to the decision of the Federal Administration. While the Federal Parliament is sitting at Melbourne the Governor General will, of course, reside there.

INDIAN FAMINE—CHOLERA DEATHS.

MR. C. P. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state the total number of deaths from cholera in the famine districts, including the native States, since the beginning of the famine.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have not yet received full statistics of cholera deaths in British districts and native States since the beginning of the famine. When cholera became severely epidemic, I asked for weekly telegrams regarding the ravages; and in my answer yesterday I quoted the totals of the figures given in those telegrams which are published with the famine telegrams in the newspapers.

FAMINE CAMPS—MEDICAL STAFF.

MR. C. P. SCOTT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the services of more than one medical man have been available at most of the large famine camps, containing from 20,000 to 30,000 people, at any time during the famine or since the outbreak of cholera.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have not received details as to the individual distribution of medical officers and medical subordinates at the different relief camps and relief houses. The Famine Codes contain full instructions for strengthening the medical staff in famine districts, for provision of hospital accommodation on relief works, for posting a medical officer or a subordinate qualified for independent charge to each hospital, for the duties of such medical officers. The instructions as to engaging additional medical officers and subordinates from outside the regular service, when need arises, are full and clear.

RAILWAY PASSENGERS' LUGGAGE.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the correspondence relating to the excess charges on passengers' luggage.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): The correspondence is at present by no means complete. When it is I will consider the propriety of laying it on the Table.

WATER GAS REGULATIONS

MR. J. W. WILSON (Worcestershire, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the Report and recommendations last year of the Departmental Committee appointed in 1898 to inquire into the manufacture and use of water gas, and also to the fact that such gas, made from coke and oil instead of coal, is being increasingly and profitably produced by gas companies, whilst local authorities owning their own gas works are now debarred from laying out such plant, owing to the refusal of the Local Government Board to sanction loans for this purpose until the regulations recommended for the use of carburetted water gas are laid down, the Board of Trade will take steps to frame such rules and regulations at an early date.

MR. RITCHIE: The Board of Trade cannot give effect to the recommendations of the Departmental Committee by rules and regulations. Legislation would be necessary, and on this point I can only say, as I did in reply to a question put by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stepney, on the 25th May, that in any general legislation my right hon. friends, the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the President of the Local Government Board, would probably have a larger interest than the Board of Trade, and that I cannot make any promise on the subject.

MR. J. W. WILSON was understood to ask: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in a great number of towns water gas is being supplied in excess of the regulation amount?

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; but if the hon. Gentleman can give me any information I shall be happy to consider it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): May I ask whether it is not a fact that analysis showed that in Dublin 20 per cent. of water gas was used contrary to the recommendations of the Home Office Committee?

MR. RITCHIE: I shall inquire into that.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN COAL EXPORTS.

MR. D. A. THOMAS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the quantities of coal shipped from this country and from the United States respectively during the eleven months ending 31st May last, to France, to Germany, and to other European countries.

MR. RITCHIE: The exports of coal, coke, etc., from the United Kingdom to the countries named in the eleven months ending 31st May, 1900, were as follows:—France, 6,969,313 tons; Germany, 4,973,634 tons; other parts of Europe, approximately 19,000,000 tons. The amounts of coal exported from the United States to these countries in the same period were:—France, 26,336 tons; Germany, 2,126 tons; other parts of Europe, 136,645 tons.

FIRE BRIGADES COMMITTEE—PREMATURE PUBLICATION OF REPORT.

SIR GEORGE FARDELL (Paddington, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Home Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the publication in The Times to-day of the principal recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee on Fire Brigades before the Report has been laid on the Table of the House and circulated, and if he will, as chairman, inform the House how this confidential document has been obtained by The Times.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley): I have seen the publication to which my hon. friend refers, and am sorry I can give him no information whatever as to how or by whom that information was given. The last act of the Committee before separating was to pledge themselves that they would give no information whatever on the subject until the Report was printed and in the hands of Members.

YORK POSTAL STAFF—ASSISTANT INSPECTOR OF POSTMEN.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that an assistant inspector of postmen at York who, although he has passed sixty years of age, has had his period of service extended another five years, is allowed to keep a shop with a beer off-licence; and whether this is in accordance with the rules of the Department.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HANBURY, Preston): When the assistant inspector of postmen referred to attained the age of sixty in April, 1899, he was reported to be efficient in the discharge of his duties, and it was decided that he might remain for the present—not for any specified number of years. As he had been in possession of the off-licence for upwards of twenty years without the knowledge of the Department, it was not, in view of his early retirement, which will very shortly take place, considered necessary to require him to relinquish it.

LIVERPOOL POST OFFICE—PRO-MOTIONS.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that a clerk in the Liverpool Postal Department has been promoted to be a superintendent after twenty-five years service, and that sixty-nine telegraphists in the Liverpool Office are awaiting promotion to the clerks class, some of them having over thirty years service, many of them being established telegraphists at the time the recently promoted officer was a corporal of messengers; and whether, in view of the Fawcett Scheme and the Tweedmouth Committee deciding that the Postal and Telegraphic branches of the Post Office should be placed on an equality, the Postmaster General will take steps to carry this into effect.

MR. HANBURY: This post of assistant superintendent on the postal side of the office was filled by the promotion of a clerk employed on postal duties who was reported to be the best qualified for the position. None of the sixty-nine telegraphists to whom the hon. Member refers would have been capable of performing the duties of the clerkship vacated by the promoted officer. The Postmaster General takes every opportunity to equalise as far as possible the prospects on the postal and telegraphic sides; but cases must always occur in which promotion is more rapid on one side than on the other.

CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE—DINNER INTERVALS.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that a number of telegraphists in the cable room, Central Telegraph Office, have been punished for exceeding the thirty minutes allowed for meal relief by one or two minutes; and that the plea of delay in the refreshment branch has been held unsatisfactory in the case of an officer who was supplied with bad meat, and needed the food changed; and whether, seeing that the dinner period is the only relief time permitted in duties which are frequently of ten and twelve hours duration, the Postmaster General will authorise a relaxation of the rule.

MR. HANBURY: No telegraphist in the cable room of the Central Telegraph Office has been punished for exceeding his dinner time—thirty minutes—under the circumstances stated in the question. When the delay has been three minutes and upwards he has been admonished; and frequent repetitions of these delays have been punished by the infliction of extra duty. But when they are proved to have arisen from causes over which the telegraphist had no control the excess time is excused. In the absence of particulars of the case to which the hon. Member refers, the Postmaster General is unable to give any information. In his opinion no relaxation of the rule, as I have stated it, is called for.

HARWICH POST OFFICE STAFF.

MR. GODDARD: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether a female telegraphist in the Harwich post office has been informed that she must be transferred from that office, and proceed at her own expense to the Enfield office; whether she is able to adequately perform all the duties of the Harwich office that are allocated to the female staff; and whether the Postmaster General will investigate the case with a view to provide against the telegraphist being compelled to attend the Enfield post office, and in the event of a transfer, that the Department will bear the cost of the removal.

MR. HANBURY: The late postmaster of Harwich had five of his relatives employed under him at the Harwich office. It is not desirable in the interest of efficient control that the staff of an office should consist to any large extent of persons who are related to one another, and it has accordingly been decided to make certain transfers of staff from Harwich to other offices. One of these transfers is that to which the hon. Member refers, and it is not proposed to alter the decision arrived at. The telegraphist concerned was wrongly informed by the present Postmaster that she would have to bear her own removal expenses. They will be defrayed up to a reasonable amount by the Department.

MR. GODDARD: Does not this telegraphist suffer some depreciation of salary by the change?

MR. HANBURY: I understand not.

NORTH DEVON NIGHT MAILS.

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devonshire, Barnstaple): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the night mails for North Devon are sent on from Exeter by luggage train, and that owing to the delay so caused and to the refusal of the Post Office to adopt the method of railway sub-offices more generally, letters are not delivered in the outlying country districts until late in the morning, and whether he will take steps to expedite the train service and to adopt in more cases railway sub-offices.

MR. HANBURY: The question of improving the night mail service to country districts in North Devon is under consideration. The cost of substituting a faster train from Exeter for that now used would be considerable, and the Postmaster General fears that such an alteration would be quite impracticable. It may be possible, however, to effect some acceleration of the local services, and the Postmaster General has caused a communication to be addressed to the local railway company enquiring what would be the cost of improving the Lynton service. If any means are found practicable for improving the postal services to Lynton and Hartland they will be readily adopted.

IMPERIAL GRANTS IN AID OF EDUCATION.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education if he can state approximately the amount which England received from the Imperial Exchequer during the financial year last ended in respect of the operation of the Voluntary Schools Act, 1897, and the Elementary Education Act, 1897.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): The amount for England and Wales was, under the first-named Act, £621,516 4s. 11d.; and under the second, £210,896 11s. 11d.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can state approximately the amount which Scotland received from the Imperial Exchequer during the financial year last ended in respect of the operation of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1897.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Butehire): The grants paid in respect of the operation of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1897, are: (1) the additional grant to school boards under Section 67 of the Act of 1872, as amended by Section 1 of the Act of 1897. The total paid under this head in the financial year last ended was £44,137 19s. 9d., of which it is estimated that £24,000 was paid in respect of the operation of the Act of 1897, the remainder having been claimable under the Act of 1872. And (2) the aid grant to Voluntary schools, amounting to £12,184 0s. 6d.

FEES IN SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES.

MR. THOMAS SHAW (Hawick Burghs): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what is the amount of the fees paid by class students in each of the Universities of Scotland; and whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to assent to the printing of a Return on the subject giving the details in accordance with the notice on the Order Paper for to-day.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I shall be happy to give the hon. and learned Member the replies which have now been received from the Universities, and if, after perusal of those documents, he will confer with the Secretary for Scotland as to the exact form in which he wishes to move for it, the Return will be granted.

POSTAL DELIVERIES IN SOUTH WESTERN SCOTLAND.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if his attention has been called to the continued irregularity of the delivery of newspapers in the South Western District of Scotland, if he will inquire into the cause, and endeavour without further delay to put matters on a better footing.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not aware of the continued irregularity in the delivery of newspapers in the South Western District of Scotland to which the hon. Member refers, but if particulars can be given of any delays which have occurred immediate inquiry on the subject shall be made.

SIR MARK STEWART: There are so many cases of delay in the delivery of newspapers for twenty-four hours. Is it not for the Post Office to find out these things for itself?

MR. HANBURY: I cannot answer that, as I do not belong to the Post Office. I will, however, consider the point.

IRISH CENSUS RETURNS.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will have arrangements made in the taking of the census in March, 1901, to obtain a Return of the number of persons in Ireland (being of three years of age or upwards) who speak English only or Irish only, or both Irish and English, in like manner as is required in the Census Bill with regard to the speaking of the Welsh language in Wales and the county of Monmouth.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): If the hon. Member will refer to the Returns of the last census in Ireland he will observe that they contained statistics of all persons who spoke Irish only, or Irish and English. Similar statistics will be collected and published in connection with the approaching census in Ireland.

MONAGHAN ASYLUM SEWERAGE SCHEME.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Governors of the Cavan and Monaghan Lunatic Asylum made a demand last week on the County Council of Monaghan for £6,500 to carry out a sewerage scheme; and that this sum is being expended without letting or offering the work by contract; whether he can state who is superintending the carrying out of this work on the asylum premises; whether he is aware that sewerage schemes costing large sums of the ratepayers' money carried out during recent years have proved a failure in the asylum; and whether he will see that the money of the ratepayers is not allowed to be lost now, and whether a contract for this work could still be taken.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: As stated by me yesterday, the Local Government Board, on the application of the Asylum Committee, have sanctioned the issue of a loan to the amount mentioned for sewerage works at the asylum, the repayment of the loan to be spread over a period of thirty years. I am informed that the works are being carried out by the employment of tradesmen and labourers under the superintendence of Mr. Peddie, a sanitary engineer of high repute, assisted by a civil engineer as clerk of works. The decision as to the manner in which such works are to be executed is vested solely in the Asylum Committee, and there is no obligation imposed upon them to let or offer the execution of such works by contract. No other sewerage scheme has been carried out at this asylum since it was built thirty-one years ago. It would be the duty of the Local Government auditor to inquire into any expenditure of an illegal or unnecessary character in connection with the asylum.

MASTERSHIP OF THE BELFAST WORKHOUSE.

MR. DALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Belfast Board of Guardians recently advertised for a master for the workhouse, that a committee of the guardians selected a number of suitable men for the position out of many applicants, and that when the day of election came the question was postponed, which in the opinion of the clerk was illegal; whether he can state the name of the gentleman that the committee thought most suitable for the mastership, and if the guardians will bear the expenses of the candidates who travelled long distances in expectation of the election taking place according to advertisement; and whether he can say what course he intends to adopt in reference to the action of the guardians in not carrying out the election of master of the workhouse on the date fixed.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The committee appointed by the guardians reported that only eight candidates for the position of master of the workhouse were qualified under the terms of the advertisement, and they recommended the guardians to issue fresh advertisements for candidates. This the guardians decided to do. The Local Government Board have no information as to the statement of opinion attributed to the clerk, or as to the matters referred to in the second paragraph. The Board do not propose to take any action respecting the postponement of the appointment, as the guardians appear to have acted within their powers.

ARREARS OF IRISH SCHOOL GRANTS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the arrears of National School Grant for 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895 will be paid only to living teachers, or will the arrears due be paid to the next-of-kin in cases in which the teacher to whom the arrears were due is dead, and whether retired teachers will be paid arrears due.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: If the money be voted by Parliament, an equivalent for the so-called arrears of school grant will, under the sanction of the Treasury, be apportioned among all teachers who were entitled to participate in the residual grant of the four years in question. In the case of those teachers since dead, their representatives will receive the amount payable. The grant will be subject to certain deductions on account of the pension fund.

SNEEM NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the National school teacher at Sneem, county Kerry, has offered at a loss to himself the necessary site for a teacher's residence, and that the only obstacle to the erection of the teacher's residence is that the Local Government Board and the local landlord cannot agree as to the suitability of the site; and whether the Government will use its influence to compel, if necessary, the Local Government Board and the local landlord to come to such an arrangement as will allow the erection of this residence to be proceeded with.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: My right hon. friend the Attorney General for Ireland replied very fully to a question addressed to him on this subject on the 9th February last.* To that reply I have nothing to add except to say that no correspondence has taken place with the Local Government Board on the subject.

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxviii., page 1056.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS' CLASS SALARY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in awarding the future income of first and second class National teachers who, owing to epidemics and severity of the weather, did not receive their full class salary for the last three years and whose results fees and residual grant were lessened in consequence, the Commissioners of National Education make due allowances for those diminutions of salary.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The hon. Member on referring to Clause 20 of the New Rules will observe that cases in which the Commissioners may deem it inequitable to fix the future incomes of the teachers on the basis of their average incomes for the past three years will be specially considered.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS—NEW SCALE OF SALARIES, CLASSIFICATION, PROMOTIONS, ETC.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain why the future scale of salaries for National teachers is omitted in the extract from the forthcoming rules of the Commissioners presented to Parliament last week; and whether he can state the future scale of salaries; whether he has observed that, by Rules 11, 12, and 13 of this extract, all assistant teachers and highly classed teachers at present in charge of small schools are degraded from the rank they previously won by good service and success at examinations; and whether he will advise the Commissioners of National Education to rule that every teacher at present in the service shall continue to retain his classification, and to be described officially as of his present rank until promoted or depressed by the rules which were in force when he won that class; whether he is aware that, by the operation of the same rules, teachers in small schools are made ineligible for promotion, and thereby prevented from qualifying for the pension of a higher class to which they were formerly entitled to aspire; and if he can take any steps to remedy this alleged grievance.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The future scale of salaries is omitted in the extract from the new code of the Commission as it has not yet been fixed by the Commissioners and submitted to the Irish Government and the Treasury. It is impossible to state the future scale of salaries except approximately. 'It is not true that by Rules 11, 12, and 13 all assistant teachers, and highly-classed teachers at present in charge of small schools, are degraded from the rank they previously won by success at examinations. Every teacher at present in the service will be described officially according to his position in the old class and the new grade in the Annual Register of Teachers. It is impossible to reply to the third paragraph of the question at present, as the necessary modifications of the pension rules have not yet been made.

IRISH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION—ANNUAL REPORT.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that the Annual Report of the Commissioners of Intermediate Education, Ireland, does not contain the names of the superintendents of examinations, the Commissioners will consider the advisability of giving the names and professions of these gentlemen in future Reports.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The suggestion in this question will be brought before the Commissioners of Intermediate Education at their next meeting.

IRISH MONITORS' EXAMINATIONS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why the results of the examinations for monitors, held in April last, have not yet been communicated to the candidates, and when will they be informed of the results; and what is the cause of the delay, seeing that over three months have now elapsed.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The results of the examinations in question will be made known without delay.

IRISH CONVICTS—MULDOWNEY AND FINIGAN.

MR. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the cases of two prisoners named Muldowney and Finigan, of Croughwell, who were convicted in Sligo and have been about seventeen years confined; and whether he will review their cases with a view to recommending His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to grant their discharge.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The prisoners named in the question were convicted of murder at the Sligo Assizes in August, 1884, and sentenced to death. The sentence was subsequently commuted to one of penal servitude for life. Their cases were under the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant in August of last year, when it was decided that the law must take its course. The case of convict Finigan was again under consideration in November, with a like result. As respects the second paragraph, it is not my province to act as suggested. Any application or memorial praying for a mitigation of sentence should be addressed to the Lord Lieutenant, in whom alone is vested the exercise of the prerogative of mercy.

MR. DILLON: When will these cases come up again in the ordinary course for reconsideration?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I cannot say; but if a memorial is presented they are immediately reconsidered.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Does not the Lord Lieutenant act on the advice of his Chief Secretary in exercising the prerogative of mercy?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: No, Sir; he does not.

IRISH MARKSMEN AT BISLEY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a team selected from twenty Irishmen representing all Ireland has won the Elcho Shield at rifle shooting; whether these men are prevented from competing for the Queen's Prize because the law prohibits Volunteer corps in Ireland; and whether he proposes to enrol Volunteers in Ireland or establish rifle clubs where all who so desire may have an opportunity of learning rifle shooting.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am aware that the Elcho Shield has been won this year by an Irish team. The second paragraph correctly assumes that legislation would be necessary for the establishment of Volunteer corps in Ireland. The question of the formation of rifle clubs should be addressed to the War Department.

POLICE REGULATIONS AT QUEENSTOWN.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether passengers arriving at Queenstown from the United States are asked by a policeman for their names and destination, and these duly noted; whether similar information is taken at Liverpool, Southampton, or any other British port at which American passengers are landed; and if not, why it is obtained at Queenstown, and passengers landing on Irish soil treated differently to those arriving in Great Britain.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am informed that the fact is as stated in the first part of the question. The information is freely given by passengers and has only once been refused during the last twelve months. The practice has existed for twenty years. I am unable to say whether similar information is taken at ports outside Ireland.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of all rules and orders made or issued under or in consequence of the Local Government (Ireland) Act since last year's Return.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Yes, the further Return referred to will be laid upon the Table.

MAYO ASSIZES—CONTEMPT OF COURT.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the failure of a motion on behalf of the Crown, made last Tuesday at the Mayo Assizes at Castlebar, to commit Mr. William O'Brien for contempt of court; whether he is aware that, so far back as October, 1882, legislation for the curtailment of the power of arbitrary committal for contempt of court was promised in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister of the day; and whether, having regard to the remarks of the Chief Justice of England in April, 1896, and to the fact that one man has actually suffered imprisonment for 743 days for that offence, the Government will take steps for the introduction of legislation to define the power of judges to commit for contempt of court, and to render that power subject to appeal.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: With respect to the first paragraph, the article published in the journal named the Irish People, in reference to which the application was made, was, in the words of the judge, calculated to prejudice the fair trial of a pending criminal prosecution and to interfere with the fair course of justice, but the failure of the application was due to the fact that though this journal had for months previously been advertised throughout the county Mayo as edited by Mr. William O'Brien, that gentleman, to the astonishment, I think, of everybody, denied on oath that he was editor in the ordinary sense, and repudiated all responsibility for the contents of the paper. As respects the second and third paragraphs, I must refer the hon. Member to my right hon. friend the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Did not the learned judge express his regret that he could not grant costs against the Crown?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am told that that is not the case.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: He said he had no statutory power.

CASTLEBAR POST OFFICE.

DR. ROBERT AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can state whether a site has yet been purchased for a post office in Castlebar, county Mayo; and, if so, what progress has been made with regard to the erection of the proposed building.

MR. HANBURY: The site for a new post office at Castlebar has now been decided upon, and arrangements will be made for building as soon as possible.

CORNALARAGH POSTAL DELIVERIES.

MR. DALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that letters for some time past have been irregularly delivered in the townland of Cornalaragh, county Monaghan, near Carrickmacross, and district; and whether, seeing that a house to house delivery in this neighbourhood has been long promised, he can state why this promise has not been carried out.

MR. HANBURY: Inquiry shall at once be made as regards the postal delivery in the townland of Cornalaragh, and as good a service shall be afforded as the circumstances warrant.

GREAGHLONE LETTER BOX.

MR. DALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the letter box at Mr. Francis Lambe's, Greaghlonge, Carrickmacross, county Monaghan, has not been visited by a postman for several days past; and, whether he can explain the reason of this neglect, and if he will take steps that this state of things will not occur again in this thickly populated district.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General regrets that, owing to a local misunderstanding, the letter box at Greaghlonge was not cleared for some days recently. Directions have been given for the box to be cleared regularly in future and at a later hour than formerly.

PHENIX PARK, DUBLIN—ORNAMENTAL WATERS, TREES, ETC.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any step has been taken to ascertain the cost of providing a lake in the Phoenix Park such as is provided to enhance public enjoyment in Hyde Park and St. James's Park, and what are the respective areas of these three parks.

MR. HANBURY: An estimate is being prepared, but important questions arise as to the source from which water should be taken and on other points which cannot be settled without some delay. The Board of Works are looking into the subject thoroughly. The area of the Phoenix Park is 1,752 acres. The area of Hyde Park is 360 acres, and of St. James's Park 93 acres.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he would ask the keepers of the London parks to furnish the keeper of Phoenix Park with a list of the ornamental trees and shrubs grown in St. James's Park and the Green Park, and give authority for any expense that may be entailed in providing for the planting of similar trees and shrubs in Phoenix Park.

MR. HANBURY: A list of the ornamental trees and shrubs which have done well in the London parks shall be sent to the Board of Works, who will decide how far they are suitable for the Phoenix Park also.

SNEEM PIER.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Congested Districts Board have built a pier at Sneem, county Kerry, at a cost of £1,500, and that a goods store is a necessity on or near the pier for the protection and storage of goods; whether he is aware that the Congested Districts Board, the trading companies calling at the pier, and the people of the locality were prepared to erect this store, and that the erection of the storehouse was prevented by Mr. Warden, the local landlord; and, can he state what steps the Government will take to compel Mr. Warden to allow the goods store to be built for protection of goods and use of the trading public.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKETT, Dublin Co., S.): The Congested Districts Board, in 1898, built a quay at Sneem, at a cost of £1,158. The Board proposed, in May, 1899, to erect a shed on the quay for the accommodation of the public, but decided to take no further steps in the matter on learning from Mr. Warden that the owners of the property adjoining the quay contemplated building a store themselves. No representations have since been made to the board on the matter. The Government have no power to take any steps such as suggested in the last paragraph.

MR. FLAVIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what objection Mr. Warden has to the Congested Districts Board building a store?

MR. PLUNKETT: We do not know that Mr. Warden has any objection. We have received no representations from the district.

IMPORTS OF RUSSIAN EGGS.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the importation of Russian eggs into Ireland, and their subsequent exportation as Irish eggs to England; and whether he will cause inquiries to be made as to this system, and take steps to prevent its continuance.

MR. PLUNKETT: The attention of the Department has been drawn to the recent representations in the public press as to the alleged importation of Russian eggs into Ireland, and their subsequent exportation as Irish eggs. The matter is being inquired into.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman see that these eggs do not reach the House of Commons?

MR. PLUNKETT: That is the duty of the Kitchen Committee.

AGRICULTURE—THE WARBLE FLY.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland whether his Department has issued leaflets to stock-owners containing instructions to prevent the warble fly from harassing and injuring cattle; and whether he intends to introduce legislation making it a penal offence for stock-owners to omit taking simple precautions to prevent the suffering caused by the warble fly to cattle and the loss to the sellers and buyers of hides.

MR. PLUNKETT: A leaflet has been issued by the Department containing instructions how to prevent the warble fly from harassing and injuring cattle. I do not think this pest can be dealt with by legislation.

HAGUE CONFERENCE—RATIFICATION OF CONVENTION.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes Convention, signed at the Hague, has been yet ratified by the Powers of Europe ; if not, when is the Convention expected to be ratified.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The ratifications of Great Britain, France, Austro-Hungary, Russia, Italy, Spain, and the United States are at present in the custody of the Netherlands Government, but the date of the ratification has not yet been definitely settled. It will probably be early in September.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Can the Leader of the House now state anything definite as to the business on Tuesday, and also when the Supplementary Army Estimate will be in the hands of Members ? It ought to be in our hands a considerable time before the statement is made.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : On Tuesday I find it is impossible for my right hon. friend the Secretary for the Colonies to have the Papers in the hands of Members in sufficient time to discuss the Colonial Office Vote. My original arrangement would, therefore, appear to be satisfactory—namely, to take the Colonial Office Vote on Tuesday next.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : When shall we have the Papers ?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I hope they will be in the hands of Members on Monday morning.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The Papers requisite to discuss the Foreign Office Vote cannot be in the hands of Members in time for the discussion on Tuesday, and therefore I will not put down the Vote for that day. It will in all probability stand first on the last day of Supply, probably Thursday week. I will put down after the Colonial Office Vote the other Votes in Class II. My hon. friend the Under Secretary for War hopes to have the terms of the Supplementary Estimate in the hands of Members on Monday, but, in any case, on Tuesday.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, F.) : Will there be any opportunity of discussing the Ashanti Vote ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : That will come after the Colonial Vote, as usual.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1900-1901.CLASS IV.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £787,503 (including a Supplementary sum of £95,434) be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Expenses of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, including a Grant in Aid of the Teachers' Pension Fund, Ireland."

*MR. O'MALLEY (Galway, Conemara): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of bringing before the Committee the unsatisfactory condition of primary education in Ireland. This House has given, and rightly given, a great deal of its time and attention to the question of education in Great Britain, and it will be admitted that vast progress has been made for the last thirty years towards educational perfection in England, Scotland, and Wales. Old methods and old systems have given way to new methods and new systems, and although the change has been slow, it has been sure and steady, and to-day the British people of all grades, and especially the poorer portion of the people, enjoy an excellent, if not a perfect, system of education. I believe that England is still behind the Continental countries in educational matters, but from year to year this House gives effect to legislation in the direction of improving it, and it may be said with truth that to-day the people of England, Scotland, and Wales have little to complain upon this question. But, Sir, how stands the case of Ireland? That is the question I wish to bring under the notice of the Committee, and I ask for its indulgence while I attempt to do so. I have seen what has been done for education in these countries within the last thirty years—old ideas and systems, as I have said, giving way to new ideas and systems; but in Ireland I have seen, during all those years, old-fashioned ideas and old-fashioned and stupid systems maintained and adhered to with, I may say, surprising tenacity and obstinacy. The same books that were in use in the so-called National schools when I was a boy are in use there to-day. One set of school books, one system of examination, one narrow set of ideas, one narrow groove. It is true that in their new rules just laid before Parliament the Commissioners have some important and satisfactory changes; but while the countries of the whole world have been for years alive to the necessity and importance of education, the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have remained ignorant or indifferent to the necessity and importance of having the people of Ireland properly and intelligently educated. But,

Sir, I do not purpose discussing in detail the out-of-date and stupid National school system of education in Ireland, nor shall I criticise the new rules. There is one phase of it, and one alone, that I want to dwell upon to-day, and that is the policy of the Commissioners of Education in ignoring the advantages of the bilingual system of instruction in those parts of Ireland where the Irish language is in general use and may be said to be the home language. Hon. Gentlemen in this House who know anything of the Welsh educational system, or who have acquired other languages than their own, will recognise the necessity and the advantage of the bilingual system, and although its importance has been urged, and strongly urged, upon the Irish Educational Commissioners, this old-fashioned and obsolete body ignore the representations made to them on this matter; and therefore, Sir, we are compelled to bring this all-important and vital subject for the proper education of our people before this Parliament. Hon. Members may be aware that this Irish language question has engaged and is engaging the anxious attention of the people of Ireland. It is a most important question, and the sooner Parliament realises that fact and deals with it the better.

We look at this question from two standpoints. We believe that as a separate entity, if I may say so; as a separate and distinct nationality; as a Celtic people, we should speak our own Celtic language. I shall not go into the policy and the methods adopted by this country in the past in penalising the Irish language, but the Irish people are now determined to restore that language as far as it is in their power to do so, so that future generations of Irishmen will be able to speak their own language just as the people of Wales to-day speak their Welsh tongue. This Parliament can help in that direction, and this Parliament is bound to recognise and respect—if it acts constitutionally—the wishes of the Irish people. That is our first standpoint. The second standpoint from which we view this question is the urgent necessity for properly educating our children in those Irish-speaking districts where Irish is the home language. The present system is altogether wrong in principle and most pernicious in its effects. It is utterly impossible to acquire a proper knowledge of the subjects taught in those schools in the Irish speaking districts unless the bilingual system is adopted. I want that fact to be thoroughly realised by the Committee, and to enable the Committee to fully appreciate it, perhaps it will allow me to quote a few passages from the report of Mr. Leggard, one of Her Majesty's Chief Inspectors of Schools in Wales. I believe efforts have been made to teach the Welsh children through the medium of English, but it has been fully recognised of late that that system was a hopeless failure, and now I believe that the bilingual system is universally adopted in the Principality. What does Mr. Leggard say in his report for 1898?

"No system can really flourish unless it is supported by national sentiment and unless it has won the affections of the people. In the case of Wales, it is clear, I think, that education has got a real hold of the popular sympathies, just as it has in the northern part of Great Britain.

"It would be well to bear in mind that in some of the Welsh-speaking districts the children never hear a word of English outside the schools, and so the English language is something quite apart from their daily life and interests, and is merely a vehicle for school lessons. . . . Should it not be frankly recognised that English is a foreign language, and that it should be taught by the best methods of teaching foreign languages? Welsh children should not merely learn bookish English, but they should be encouraged from the infants' school upwards to talk in the foreign tongue about things that interest them—their homes, their games, their pet animals; and when a vocabulary is acquired simple rules of grammar will gradually be deduced, and the children will be trained in due course by speaking correctly to write correctly. Instruction in English on the lines I have indicated should help Welsh children to appreciate better their own mother tongue.

"For Welsh-speaking districts such explanatory instruction (on other subjects beside reading) should in the earlier years of school life be to a great extent given in the vernacular, and the children will thus be able to assimilate what they hear. This they cannot do while they are puzzled by the unfamiliar sounds of an unknown tongue."

Mr. L. J. Roberts, one of Mr. Leggard's colleagues, in his report for the same year, remarks—

"The use of bilingual reading-books systematically throughout a school helps to do away with the difficulties of the Welsh child. He gains self-confidence, he sees delicate varieties of meaning which he could not otherwise grasp, his taste for reading in both languages is developed, and the mere practice of comparing the idioms of two languages is itself a valuable mental exercise."

Mr. O'Malley.

Mr. Jones, another colleague of Mr. Leggard, says in his report—

“The future of Welsh education is very promising, and the Welsh people have now placed within their reach educational advantages which were undreamt of at the beginning of the century.”

Can that be said of Ireland? I ask again: Can that be said of Ireland? and if not, why not? That is the question.

I now come to a report by Mr. Darlington, another Welsh school inspector. Mr. Darlington says—

“I feel strongly that reading as at present taught is not doing as much as it might do in the direction of stimulating the general intelligence of the scholars. The fact that in teaching a Welsh child to read English we are really teaching him the use of a foreign language is at present not sufficiently taken into account, and one feels too often that a mechanical fluency in reading English is accompanied by the vaguest possible notion of the sense of the passage read. The use of bilingual readers has done much to make the reading lesson a more intelligent exercise. Still more satisfactory results are obtained in schools where the practice of oral translations forms a regular part of the reading lesson.”

These reports, from which I have given only a few extracts, are taken from the general report of Mr. Leggard, the Chief Inspector. Mr. Leggard concludes his enlightened and interesting report in these words—

“I will only say in conclusion that the state of elementary education in Wales is full of encouragement, provided those concerned with it do not rest contented with their achievements in the past, but endeavour to make steady and united progress in the future.”

I am sure hon. Members will agree with me that there should be no further necessity for me to argue the point as to the advantages of the bilingual system where English is not the home language. I have quoted from the reports of several Welsh school inspectors in support of my case, and now I shall quote from a solitary Irish Commissioner—Dr. Starkie, who stands alone, or almost alone, in the wilderness of prejudice, ignorance, and antediluvianism which surrounds the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland. Dr. Starkie, in a speech last February, used these words—

“The National Board had made a disastrous blunder in thrusting on a Gaelic-speaking race a system of education produced after a foreign model and utterly alien to their sympathies and antecedents. The attempt was unsound (he continued), both philosophically and practically. The Board were guilty of narrow pedantry in neglecting as worthless the whole spiritual life of the pupil, and the multitude of associations, imaginations, and sentiments that formed the content of his consciousness. To this unhappy blunder may be attributed the want of initiative and independence, and distaste of knowledge, which so hamper the industrial development of Ireland—qualities so alien to the quick sympathies and alert intelligence which are the most salient characteristics of our race.”

It is quite refreshing to come across an Irish official with such broad, enlightened, and patriotic views. As far as I know, there is only one Nationalist on this educational board—Archbishop Walsh, and not only is he a Nationalist but he is a man of great culture, and he is a strong advocate for the bilingual system. Who are the other Commissioners? The present members are the following—

In that list of twenty gentlemen, I venture to say that with the exception of Dr. Walsh there is not a man amongst them who is not a Unionist. They are men who have a horror of every Nationalist sentiment, who are steeped to the lips in bigotry, prejudice, and intolerance, men who see in this Gallic League movement, the Scarlet Lady of Rome or a Republican Ireland. These are the gentlemen the Government of this country entrust the education of the Catholic and Nationalist people of Ireland to! Is it any wonder that the Irish people hate your modes of governing their country?

Well, Sir, school inspectors have strongly recommended the use of bilingual systems in several parts of Ireland. The Bishops of Ireland have recommended it. Cardinal Logue, the head of the Irish Episcopacy, is a missionary in the work. Over 200 school managers—representing over a thousand schools—Protestants as well as Catholics, have petitioned the fossils in favour of it. Public bodies, such as poor law guardians, county councils, district councils galore, have passed resolutions in favour of it. In fact, Sir, practically the whole of Ireland is most earnestly in favour of the bilingual system; and I suppose it is because they are in favour of it that the Commissioners are against it. Such is the way we are governed in Ireland.

I am now, Sir, going to tell the Committee what, I suppose, I should have told it in the beginning of my observations: that we have still in Ireland a large number of people who speak only the Irish language, and still a larger number who speak both languages—Irish and English. Along the coast from Donegal, round west to Waterford, there are at least 30 per cent. of the people speaking the Gaelic tongue. I hold in my hand a table showing the population in 1891—the last census—of eleven counties, Clare, Cork, Donegal, Galway, Kerry, Limerick, Mayo, Roscommon, Sligo, Tipperary, and Waterford. The total population in these eleven counties in 1891 was 2,004,193, or nearly half the population of the whole of Ireland. The number of Irish speakers as given in the census list was 638,821, so that the percentage of persons speaking Irish in 1891 was 32. The total number of children in the primary schools at that time was 308,269, and 32 per cent. of that number would give 95,734 children as speaking the Irish language in 1891. That is under the estimate, because a great many of them will not admit that they speak Irish. In many of these counties Irish is the home language—that is, the children never hear a word of English spoken except while they are in school. I know this to be a fact, for throughout the whole of Connemara, my own constituency, the people invariably talk to each other in Irish. Is it not monstrous to think that these children are handicapped in life by this stupid unilingual system, which not only leaves the children uneducated, but positively works mental and moral destruction upon them? I daresay the superior Englishman will only see another sentimental Irish grievance in this. Be it so. Your attitude will only add another link to that long chain that binds, not England and Ireland in loving brotherhood, but adds a link to that chain that binds the people of Ireland and the people of the Irish race in a bond of hatred and ill-will to your infernal system and methods of governing our country.

The Chief Secretary is reported to have stated in this House, four years ago—

“He could not see that it was desirable to artificially stimulate the study of Irish. If there was a national desire to do so, he would not stand in the way of it. There were, it is true, districts in Ireland where the national language was the language of the people, and where that was the case it was probably true that the best way to teach the children was to teach them in the language that they naturally spoke.”

These were his words, and I thank the Chief Secretary for having uttered them. I hope he will see the necessity of pushing these sentiments into effect. What has he done to satisfy the national demand? Does he want further evidence before he is satisfied that there is a national demand? The Irish Members to a man support this claim. But of course they do not count. Does Cardinal Logue count? Do the Bishops of Ireland count? What of the 200 managers that memorialised the Commissioners? Do they not count? What of the public bodies? Do they count? I will give the right hon. Gentleman something that may perhaps count—that certainly should count. I have here a resolution from the Central Executive of the National Teachers' Association, and with the permission of the House I will read it—

“That as practical educationists we heartily endorse the statement made by Dr. Starkie, the Resident Commissioner of National Education, in his speech at Glasnevin on the 19th February last, that the National Board was guilty of a disastrous blunder in thrusting upon a Gaelic-speaking race a system of education produced after a foreign model and utterly alien to their sympathies and antecedents. In order, therefore, that tardy justice might be done to tens of thousands of children in the Irish-speaking districts, we hereby demand that in all places where Irish is the home language pupils shall be taught to read and write Irish from their first entrance into school,” etc.

I will quote one other authority. At the National Teachers' Congress, recently held, the following resolution was unanimously passed—

“That we cordially recommend all National teachers to use their opportunities on behalf of the preservation of the Irish language. Being an important aid to a proper elementary education throughout the country, and its use in instruction being recommended to teachers by the Commissioners of National Education, we deeply regret the want of provision for the instruction of teachers, and request the Commissioners and the managers of the training colleges to have professors of Irish in those colleges. That while not desiring to reduce the extent of the programme for a certificate of competency to teach Irish, we believe that in the matter of text-books the programme could be considerably improved. We are also strongly of opinion that the programme for pupils should be so altered as to extend over five years, be more suitably graduated, and be freed as much as possible from unpractical matter. That in all places where Irish is the home language, the pupils shall be taught to read and write Irish from their first entrance into the school,” etc.

I shall trouble the Committee with one more quotation. Father O’Leary, the parish priest of Castlelyons, co. Cork, writing in the Freeman’s Journal of last Tuesday, in reply to Lord Russell of Killowen, who unfortunately is one of the very few educated Irishmen who do not see eye to eye with us in this matter. Father O’Leary puts the case admirably, and I shall only quote a few lines from his argument proving the evil results from the unilingual system. Father O’Leary says—

“I will ask his Lordship to accompany me in spirit while we pay a visit to a ‘National School’ situated in one of the Irish-speaking districts of this country. There stands the teacher. He never speaks a single word of Irish to any of his pupils. Look at the faces of the children, especially those whose home speech is Irish unmixed. They are like French children who never spoke a word of English, placed in an English school, and forbidden to speak a single word of French. There is a fixed, dull, closed-up expression on their faces. Examine them in their lessons. They repeat syllables of words, but you can see at once that the words are not for them the expression of ideas. Ask the meaning of a word. They repeat the syllables of the meaning exactly as given at the head of the lesson, but for them the meaning has no meaning. Ask for the sense of a sentence. The answer is dead silence. A parrot is not capable of giving the sense of phrases which he utters. Follow those children home. Hear them plunge into their native element. The dull, fixed expression disappears from the face at once. All the varying beams of keen intelligence shine forth at every word and at every turn of expression. The following day they put on again the mask of dulness.”

VOL. LXXXVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

If the right hon. Gentleman, and if this House is not satisfied with the volume of public and enlightened opinion which I have referred to, upon the necessity and urgency of introducing a bilingual system in certain districts in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman and this House will never be satisfied with any further evidence on the matter, unless, indeed, they got some outward and visible sign of the indignation and disgust that will fill the breasts of Irishmen if their reasonable and moderate claim is not soon recognised. But I do not despair that this House here to-day will mark its appreciation of our just claim in this language question. The speech of one moment from those benches opposite would be worth more than all our speeches put together. I hope we shall have some speeches from those benches in our favour to-day. I would appeal to the Committee to listen to us for once while we make our most moderate claim. We have heard a good deal in the last few years of your having robbed us of two and a half millions a year for many years. That may have been to your material advantage. But in robbing us of our native language you have robbed us of that which has not enriched you, but has made us poor indeed. In conclusion, I say, give us back our language. Revise your educational systems in Ireland, so that our children, in those Irish speaking districts that I have referred to, shall be enabled, as Welsh children are enabled, to acquire a proper knowledge of English, which is now more necessary than ever for their equipment in the battle of life. Do something genuine and substantial to promote and encourage the revival of our Gaelic tongue in our primers and intermediate schools. It will cost you little or nothing to do so. And if you now respond to the universal and passionate demand of the Irish people and of the Irish race, although you will be doing but simple justice, you will be going a long way towards making reparation for the countless wrongs your country has inflicted upon Ireland. Sir, I move to reduce the Vote.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I desire to second the motion which has been made by my hon. friend in the admirable speech which he has just delivered. I confess that I regret that there is such a scanty attendance in the House, because it is impossible to conceive a subject which more deeply interests the people of Ireland than the one which is now under discussion. Sir, Ireland takes a keen interest in this question, because Ireland believes that the whole future of the Irish race may be said to be largely bound up with this question. In the whole history of English misgovernment in Ireland I believe there is no such glaring instance as this of flagrant disregard of the unanimous public opinion of the country and of obstinate stupidity in a disastrous course. This matter concerns the people of Ireland vitally, because it concerns the education of the great mass of the poorer children in Ireland—that is, those who will be the future Irish nation. Now, Sir, allow me, without repeating any of the arguments used by my hon. friend in moving this motion, to state in my own words as concisely as I can what the case is we desire to present to the House. Roughly speaking, it is estimated that there are some 700,000 Irish-speaking people in Ireland, and it is estimated that there are some 70,000 Irish children attending the National schools who do not know one single syllable of English. Now, Sir, for these 70,000 children there is no provision whatever.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Do I understand the hon. Gentleman to say that there are 70,000 children in Ireland at the present time who are unable to speak a word of English?

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I say it is estimated that there are 70,000 children attending these National schools—perhaps I put it a little too far in saying that they do not know a syllable of English—who know little or no English, and whose home language is Irish.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: According to the census of 1891 the total number of Irish-speaking persons in Ireland was only 31,121.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I still maintain that the figures I have given to the Committee are correct. But, after all, it is a question of degree; and if the right hon. Gentleman supposes that his figures are right and the figures supplied to me

are wrong, how far will that bring him in refusing? Because if it is only a question of 36,000 children, or of 30,000 children, or of 20,000 children, still the case would be a monstrous one if no provision whatever is to be made for the proper teaching of these children. But it is not merely that there is no special provision whatever for the teaching of these children, whose home language is Irish, but there is no provision whatever in other districts, where Irish is not so much spoken, to enable Irish to be taught as a remunerated subject in school hours. The case which we make is this: that in all places—I speak not now of children who cannot speak a word of English—but in all cases, in all districts where the home language is Irish, the children from those homes going into the National schools should be taught to read and write their own language, and should be taught English through the medium of their own language; and in the second place that Irish ought to be taught in all schools of Ireland as a remunerated subject in school hours wherever the circumstances of the school, in the opinion of the managers, warranted it. That is the demand, stated as concisely as I think it is possible to state it. Let me ask now who makes the demand. Sir, I believe it would be impossible to find a demand made with more complete unanimity from the people of Ireland than this one. In the first place, let me point out that the demand has been formally brought before the Board of National Education in Ireland on a memorial from the managers of 1,200 National schools in the Irish-speaking districts. It is supported, as my hon. friend has mentioned, by the declarations of the Irish bishops. I may be allowed to repeat what the Irish bishops have said. This is the unanimous resolution passed by the Catholic bishops of Ireland—

“We strongly recommend that in the primary schools in all Irish-speaking districts the instruction should be bilingual, English being taught through the medium of Irish. We also regard it as most desirable in the primary schools of other districts that the Irish language should be taught to the children in the third and the higher classes wherever the managers of the schools deem it advisable, and the parents make no objection.”

And in addition to the unanimous declaration of all the Catholic bishops in Ireland, there are members of the Protestant Episcopacy who take the same view ; and some of them—one of whom has recently passed away (I mean the late Dr. Greaves)—take a most passionate interest in this question. Almost all the public-elected boards in Ireland have made similar expressions. Corporations, county councils, district councils, town commissions, urban and district councils, who have spoken—and many of them have spoken on the question—have given expression to the same view. There is also the unanimous declaration laid before the Board of National Education from the clerical managers of the schools in the province of Connaught, which is the province chiefly concerned in this demand. Then there is the declaration which has been alluded to by my hon. friend, made by the executive of the National Teachers' Association—that is to say, the men who are engaged in the practical work of teaching in the schools, and who, so far from raising any objection, desire that this concession should be made, and that Irish should be taught in their schools. The same demand comes from the National Teachers' Congress, held the other day in the city of Derry. The Irish Members of Parliament are unanimous in supporting this demand. I do not know whether there is any individual Irish Member of Parliament who has any objection to Irish being taught in the National schools, but I have never heard of one ; certainly it is safe to say that the overwhelming majority of Irish Members of all parties in this House take the same view. Perhaps the most remarkable testimony that this view is a sound one has come from the ranks of the National Board itself. Dr. Starkie has been alluded to, and my hon. friend has quoted some of his words. I am not going back upon them now, although perhaps I may have again to allude to them before I conclude ; but I would point out that this demand comes from the most responsible Commissioner of the Board of National Education in Ireland, backing up the unanimous request from every public body and every representative of public opinion in Ireland. And, Sir, I can quote the Chief Secretary as a friend to this demand. My hon. friend quoted a declaration which the Chief Secretary made some years ago ; but this very session the right hon. Gentleman, if I am not mistaken, in answer to a question across the floor of the House, made a most friendly declaration. He did not perhaps go the extreme length that some advocates of the Gaelic revival in Ireland go, but he made a most sympathetic answer, because he said first he fully believed that where Irish was the language of the children their education could be more fully carried out through the medium of their own language.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Hear, hear !

MR. JOHN REDMOND: That, no doubt, refers to children who come from Irish-speaking homes. In the second place, the Chief Secretary went on to say—

“While I could not undertake to artificially stimulate the study of Irish, yet if there is a widespread demand for its teaching I would not stand in the way.”

Therefore, Sir, I think I am justified in quoting the right hon. Gentleman himself as a friend to the demand which is now made. Now, Sir, I think I have said enough to show that it would be quite impossible to conceive a demand more influentially put forward and more universally supported in Ireland than this demand which we put forward to-day. It is supported by every class of the population ; it is supported by the hierarchy and the clergy of not one, but, I believe, of all denominations in Ireland. It is supported by the managers of the schools, by the teachers of the schools, by the elected representatives of the people, whether in this House or in the public boards, throughout the country, and I think I am justified, therefore, in my assertion that no more influential demand was ever made in this House. Having stated what the demand is, and why we are making it, let me consider whether the demand is in itself reasonable, moderate, and based upon precedent, and whether it is not really one which, from an Irish point of view, should be considered in the general interest of the country. Is it reasonable ? The present system of teaching in the Irish-speaking districts has been proved by bitter experience to be useless, and that is the explanation of the alarming proportion of illiterates which obtains in many districts of Ireland. The whole experience of this attempt to teach English through the medium of English to children who come from Irish-speaking homes has been to show that these children, after they leave school, rapidly lapse into illiteracy. All experience proves that the bilingual system of education for such districts is the best. I am loth to trouble the House, but I would like to read one or two sentences from a very weighty memorial which has been presented to the National Board of Education from the managers of 1,200 schools. That memorial has been treated with the scantiest courtesy, and so far as I can see has received no answer at all. These gentlemen, Protestant and Catholic alike included in the list of the managers of 1,200 schools, say—

“The children of these districts come from Irish-speaking homes, where all the familiar converse of life, and, still more, all the higher and more spiritual ideas, are habitually expressed by their parents and elders in Irish. The first foundations, and the most important part of the mental development of the children are thus naturally made in the Irish language. We consider it to be a radical error, on the entrance of the children into school, to completely ignore the natural foundations thus laid, and to commence de novo their education in an unfamiliar language. To ignore the utility of Irish in teaching these children from the outset, is, in our opinion, a primary blunder for many reasons. It is in itself an unnatural and irrational method of education. It deliberately puts on one side all that the children may have learned not alone of the vocabulary of common life, but of the finer shades of thought and feeling which are eminently characteristic of the Irish language. It also puts aside the spiritual traditions of the Irish language, leaving their place to be supplied by what should only supplement them, and could be made to supplement them, in Irish as well as, or better than, in English—namely, direct memorised instructions. Experience has shown that the native traditional taste for poetry and other forms of literature and for music is taken away from the people along with their native language. A still more grievous evil is that their respect for home, parents, national traditions, and the past of their own people is undermined by the present system, and thus the foundations of the civic virtues of self-respect and self-reliance, so conducive to the welfare of a people, are shaken from the commencement. It often happens under the present system that after a number of years at school young people practically lapse into illiteracy, and forget how to read and write simple English. Even of those who may seem to have profited more a large number have little better than a mechanical proficiency, and from the standpoint of material advancement are hardly to be distinguished from the class of illiterates. We believe that these defects in education will be removed by teaching the children to read and write, and utilise to its fullest capacity the language in common use among the grown people in these districts. This belief is not grounded solely on a priori reasons, but is fully borne out by the experiences of primary education in Great Britain, where for some years the Welsh language has been employed in education in the way in which we seek to have Irish employed.”

I ought, perhaps, to apologise for reading so lengthy an extract, but the sound reasonable argument contained in it deserves the serious attention of all interested in the education of the young in Ireland. For my part I do not know what is the answer to it. Dr. Starkie, Resident Commissioner of National Education, has spoken much to the same effect. He says—

“The cause is not far to seek why the National system has not had the full measure of success which its friends would desire for it. From the first its besetting sin has been centralisation. From the centre in Dublin the National Board, disregarding all differences of race and creed and local prejudices, has imposed on all parts of the country a rigid programme, perhaps ideally satisfactory, but in many cases ludicrously ill adapted to the needs of the backward districts of Ireland, and to the capacities of the pupils. As an illustration of my meaning I may refer to the treatment accorded to what seventy years ago was really the national tongue. Without committing myself to the extravagances of some of the enthusiasts of the Gaelic League, I fancy few practical educationalists will deny that the National Board were guilty of a disastrous blunder in thrusting upon a Gaelic-speaking race a system of education produced after a foreign model and utterly alien to their sympathies and antecedents. Such an attempt was unsound, both philosophically and practically. Neglecting the principle of continuity which pervades all human things, it disregarded the home training and associations of the children, and thus rendering in twain the nascent intelligence, rendered all real development impossible. True education is a refining and developing of the whole intellectual life and character, and I think there can be little doubt that the Board were guilty of narrow pehantry in neglecting as worthless the whole previous spiritual life of the pupil, and the multitude of associations, imaginations, and sentiments that formed the content of his consciousness. The consequences of such a system are inevitable. To this unhappy blunder may be attributed the want of initiative and independence, and distaste of knowledge, which so hampers the industrial development of Ireland—qualities so alien to the quick sympathies and alert intelligence which are the most salient characteristics of our race.”

I saw yesterday in The Times a most interesting letter from Mr. Edmund Gosse, in which he speaks of the Irish language in this way—

“Irish has been in literary use for centuries, which has held the thoughts of generations of great men, which has preserved a poetry of singular mystery and tenderness. Whether we read Irish or not—for my part I am with the Saxon majority—that tongue has been for centuries an unseen but priceless appanage of

Mr. John Redmond.

British literature. The language of Ireland has been blossoming there unseen, like a hidden garden of roses, and, whenever the wind has blown from the West, our English poetry has felt the vague perfume of it."

It is interesting to know that even the most vehement opponents of the study of Irish, such as Dr. Atkinson and others like him, still admit that children coming from where Irish is the familiar language ought to be taught English through the medium of Irish. Dr. Atkinson went before the Commission as the great opponent of the Gaelic revival, and yet he used these words—

"These children should be taught Irish, and they would learn it with very great advantage because they speak it from their childhood . . . If they spoke it, then it would be right to teach them in their own mother tongue. It is wrong to children not to teach them in their mother tongue . . . If they know Irish better than English coming into the school, let their education be Irish. If the child thinks in the Irish language, let him be taught in the Irish language."

Surely I have said enough to show that the demand which is made is in itself a reasonable one, and that it has the support of the most eminent educational authorities in Ireland. Let me ask for a moment whether the demand is without precedent. We are not asking for anything strange, extravagant, or unheard of. As a matter of fact, we are asking for that which is to-day possessed by Wales, and not more than is possessed by the Highlands of Scotland. I want to know by what constitutional theory can this demand, put forward by practically every class and creed in Ireland, and proved to be reasonable in the opinion of skilled educationalists, is to be refused, and why an irresponsible body of men nominated by the Crown, or a majority of them, is to insist in excluding this Irish language from our schools in spite of the universal desire of the people of Ireland? What we ask for to-day is less than exists in Wales. In the Welsh Code for 1900, it is set forth that the Welsh language is one of the subjects which may be taken up if it suits the circumstances of the schools, and the managers approve. Then, in the standard of examinations on elementary subjects there is dictation from Cymric reading-books. In Welsh translations from English, the written examination may be in both English and Welsh, and there is history reading both in Welsh and English. Further, I find that English is to be taught bilingually. Special provision is also made for the training of the teachers in Welsh, and in their examinations they are obliged to be able to read Welsh and recite Welsh poetry. Under the head of history, the teachers must show a knowledge not only of English history, but of the history of Wales prior to the union with England; and further, submit to a test of their knowledge of the history of Wales generally. I want to know why all this should be given to Wales and denied to Ireland. All that we ask is that the bilingual system of teaching should be set up in Irish-speaking districts where the children come from Irish-speaking homes, and that in other districts Irish may be one of the remunerated subjects taught, if the managers so desire it, in the school hours. The Scotch Code makes almost precisely the same provision. In the Gaelic-speaking districts, that is, in the counties of Inverness, Argyll, Ross and Cromarty, and Sutherland, an extra pupil-teacher is allowed in respect of bilingual teaching, and provision is made also for the teaching of Gaelic in the training colleges. It seems to me that a demand put forward as this has been, and supported by all classes of the people of Ireland, proves to be reasonable and based on the precedents of Scotland and Wales, and that the contemptuous rejection of that demand by this nominated, irresponsible, and intensely anti-national Board is a most monstrous thing, which the House of Commons ought not to tolerate for one instant. There is another aspect of the question which appeals to us Irishmen, however it may appeal to English Members. At this moment—and there is no use of the Chief Secretary underrating the feeling of the Irish—an intense and passionate movement exists in favour of saving the remnants of the Irish tongue for the Irish people of the future. It is natural, because to all Irishmen, whatever their class, or creed, or politics, who are proud of their country, of its history, of its traditions, when in the old times, almost alone among Western nations, Ireland held aloft the lamp of learning and cherished the truths of religion, this neglect of the ancient tongue of their forefathers must seem an unpardonable wrong; and I say in a special way to all those who love the songs and stories and folk lore of Ireland, to all those—“Who love a nation's legends,

Love the ballads of a people,
That, like voices from afar off,
Speak in tones so plain and childlike,
Scarcely can the ear distinguish Whether they are sung or spoken”— to all such who treasure poetry, the romance and the music of their country, as things which give individuality and character to their race, and almost a soul to their nation—to all such men, this wanton attempt to destroy the Irish tongue must seem an outrage and a sacrilege. The injury to Ireland is a material and a moral one at the same time. This system undoubtedly dwarfs the intellects and stunts the minds of the young children of Ireland, on whom will depend the future well-being and prosperity of the country. It deprives them of all knowledge of a glorious past, and shuts them out from the slightest glimpse of the poetic and romantic literature, and it places upon them the humiliating badge of inferiority. This authority in Ireland must not be permitted to do this wrong, and we are here to appeal to every independent Member of the House to aid in preventing this wrong being perpetrated in future. We appeal in an especial way to those kinsmen of ours of the Celtic race who are here from Scotland and Wales. We ask them to assist us in putting an end to this wrong, and in helping us to do for our country what they have succeeded in doing for their own—to protect the ancient tongue of our forefathers, in which is enshrined so much of the glorious heritage that has come down through the centuries to Ireland from her sages, her poets, her scholars, and her statesmen.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That a sum, not exceeding £787,403, be granted for the said Service.”—(Mr. O'Malley.)

MR. RENTOUL* (Down, E.): This is in no sense, in my opinion, a political question, but one which we may discuss quite freely, although we may take different views upon the subject; and I must say that with the views which have been expressed upon the opposite side of the House I disagree in every particular. That being so, I desire to put before the Committee the reasons which have led me to the conclusion at which I have arrived. The hon. Gentleman who moved this motion said everything that could possibly be said in its favour from that side of the House, and, although the seconder of the motion made an eloquent and most powerful speech, he did not add much, if anything, to the arguments already urged by the hon. Gentleman whom he supported. The mover of the motion made an attack on the books used in the schools of Ireland, and in that respect I entirely disagree with him. I have studied those books as a boy, and have since compared them with the books used in English schools, and I have come to the deliberate conclusion that there are no books anywhere which are better than those used by the National School Board of Ireland. There are several of the Irish school books which could not possibly be beaten for the purposes for which they are designed. But the question before the Committee is the question of the Irish language, and I only refer in passing to the books, and I say that I have not been able to agree with the observations with regard to them made by the hon. Gentleman. Coming to the Irish language itself, I think the bilingual system is an excellent one, and to learn two languages perfectly is far better than to learn half a dozen imperfectly. For a man to be able to speak two languages is a very great advantage; it broadens his mind, and enables him to enlarge his knowledge and acquire other subjects. But are two languages, properly learned, possible for the poor people of any country? Are there any countries where the working classes learn two languages? [A VOICE from the Irish benches: Yes—Wales.] In many parts of Wales it is true that Welsh is spoken as the mother tongue, and the people as they grow up acquire English; but take France or Germany, or any other Continental country. Are the poor people of those countries able to speak two languages? Does such a thing exist anywhere?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Yes, in half a dozen places.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): What about Antwerp?

MR. RENTOUL*: I should certainly like to see that assertion proved, and Antwerp does not prove it. Those who have lived among Continental nations will admit they have never come across anything of the sort. You may go through the city of Paris, or Berlin, or other Continental cities from end to end before you find two mechanics who have really learned more than one language, and it is not for us in this House to make statements which are not borne out by the facts. [Interruption from the Irish benches.] Hon. Gentlemen will have an opportunity to prove the statement they make; but surely it is only fair that a man should be allowed to express his opinions with regard to the teaching of a language, even if they do not coincide with those of the hon. Gentleman opposite. I do not believe it is possible for the working people of any country to learn two languages, and I have not come across any who have. They have neither the time nor the inclination. But supposing it were possible for two languages to be taught, would it be wise for the Irish people to make the ancient language of their country the second one? Do the Irish people who send their children to expensive schools in Ireland make the Irish language one of the languages to be taught to their children? They have them taught French or German, but do they have them taught the Irish language? And is it wise to try to encourage the lower classes in a study of a language which the higher classes themselves have not learned and do not teach their children? If it were possible to learn any number of languages one would be very glad to have Irish taught as one of them; but the time for learning spoken languages is limited, and the number of languages one can learn is limited, and human intellect is limited, everywhere except among Irish Nationalists. Now, speaking of this particular language, we know that men and women of the better classes do not have their children taught Irish [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I ask what member of the Irish party in this House is having his children taught Irish? I am very far from making an attack upon the Irish language. The hon. Member for East Mayo alluded to a man who spoke of Irish literature as disgusting and abominable. That is certainly the last charge I would make—for one reason, that I am not sufficiently familiar with Irish literature to make such an attack—nor do I think that any good is done by making an attack of that sort, especially as all

Celtic scholars admit that the ancient Irish literature is much richer and more beautiful than the literature of any of the other five Celtic languages. We know that there are historical documents in the Irish language of the highest possible order, and poems—epic, lyric, and didactic—of unrivalled beauty and marvellous pathos; but there is a difference between teaching a language to a whole people and preserving the ancient documents of that language. Is anyone taught in Italy to speak the Latin which was spoken in ancient Rome? Yet it is not as a dead language, but as a living one, that hon. Gentlemen wish Irish to be taught. The mover of the motion spoke, in reference to the teaching of the Irish language, of its value. If he refers to its value to philologists, no one disagrees with him; but if he refers to its practical value, then I assert that it has hardly any value. It seems to me that the practical value of a language depends entirely upon the number of people who speak it.

MR. DILLON: Then Chinese should be the most valuable language in the world.

*MR. RENTOUL: I am glad to be able to answer the hon. Gentleman upon that point. Only some two years ago a movement was started by many leading men in London to try and get Chinese taught even in preference to French or German, because of its greater commercial value. Of course, if a language is only to be learned for mere sentimental reasons, and not for reasons of travel, trade, or other practical purposes, we can well understand that a language which is spoken at the top of a mountain in Russia by about 150 people altogether would be the most valuable of languages, because it is one of the rarest and most peculiar. Speaking of European languages, would any man wish his children to be taught Portuguese in preference to French or Italian or Spanish? And yet Portuguese is an excellent language. Is not the feeling of all men who have to do with the study of modern languages to go in this direction when they say that the more a language is what they call a world speech or umgangssprache language, the more is that language one that ought to be learned? Discussion is often carried on as to whether German or French is the more valuable language—that is, which affects the larger number of people? If a man is to have only one language, I think it is clear to everyone that the most valuable language he can have is English, and next to that is French, because French will serve you in a greater number of the countries of the world than any other language except English. Except for sentimental reasons it would be absolutely valueless to teach the Celtic language in Ireland. The value of a language depends not merely on the use you can make of it not in your own country, but of the use you can make of it when you leave your own country. [Laughter.] I must say that I fail entirely to see what is in the minds of hon. Members. If I were going to travel I would certainly very much prefer that my own language was English rather than Portuguese. Portuguese may be a better language from the grammarian's point of view than English, but it would not serve me one-twentieth as much as English would do. If a language is to serve the purpose for which it was intended—namely, that men may convey their ideas to the men whom they meet—necessarily, the greater the number of people who speak a language the more the value of that language to men who are going about the world and doing the business of the world. The mover of the motion spoke of the value of the Irish language. But what real value has it? If he wants the people of Ireland to learn a Continental language he will recollect how much they would be handicapped from the entire absence of books for teaching French, German, or Italian, or any Continental language through the medium of the Irish language. It has been argued—I do not know whether it was referred to in this debate—as one strong reason in favour of teaching the Celtic language that the Jews, who are passionately attached to their own religion and nationality, teach the Hebrew language as well as the language of the country in which they are placed. That is easily explained. They never teach colloquial or cursive Hebraic. They teach the language of their prayers and of ecclesiastical documents, but they do not teach their children colloquial Hebrew as they teach them French or German. So that if any argument is to be drawn from what the Jews do, it would prove that the Irish people should teach their children Latin, that being the language of the prayers and ecclesiastical documents of the Church of the large majority of the people of Ireland. The first question to settle is, what is the purpose for which you desire the second language? Is it for sentiment or for practical purposes? If it is for sentiment, can Ireland in her present commercial and financial position afford to sacrifice practical utility to sentiment? If the second language is wanted for practical purposes, then comes the question, what do other nations do which have an ancient language still lingering among a few of the lower orders of the people and yet have as the real language of the people some imported tongue? What do practical and prosperous peoples do in such circumstances? Take the case of the Belgians. Their ancient language is Flemish. They do not teach French through Flemish, they do not teach Flemish at the expense of French. I had an opportunity, when in Belgium not long ago, of hearing a number of classes examined, and I was told that there is a desire there on the part of educationists to relegate the Flemish language to the category of ancient history, and to make the French language the speech to be used in the country. We know that the Belgians are, perhaps, the most practical people in the whole of Europe. We are told that there are no people so successful according to their numbers, or who make so good a use of life's opportunities generally. That is the experience of highly practical men in connection with an extremely energetic people, and the example of the Belgians is very much in point when Irishmen are discussing this question not from a political but from a purely practical point of view, as showing what is best for the country in its practical interests. If Irish were spoken as much as English in America, Australia, and other countries where Irishmen go, I should certainly think then there was something to be said for making Irish the language of the country. I do not suppose Irish is a worse language from any point of view, but I look at this question from the practical side, and we cannot get over the fact that Irish is not spoken elsewhere. A good deal has been said about the advantage of teaching English as far as possible through Irish to the pupils in Irish schools. I may be in an extreme minority in this matter—I fancy that the Chief Secretary is probably against me—but that would not be my aim. If I were to-morrow going to learn a foreign language I should prefer to be taught that language through itself, and to make what effort I could to understand it. I believe I would arrive at a knowledge of that language quicker in that way. The hon. Member for South Donegal seems to be highly amused by that statement, but after all, a great many Members of the House have done exactly what I have said. Numerous Members of the House have gone to foreign countries without knowing the language at all. They did not go to lodge with an English family to learn French, or German because they were English-speaking people. No; they plunged into a foreign house altogether, and picked up the language as well as they could, that being the quickest way in which the language could be acquired, so that by only teaching English through Irish in the schools in Ireland you would not adopt the quickest mode of acquiring a knowledge of English. The people of Ireland, as regards their relation to the Irish language, are of three classes: first, those who do not know Irish, which is nine-tenths of the people; second, those who know and speak both English and Irish; and thirdly, some thirty or forty thousand who know only Irish. The first class had better leave Irish alone; the second class had better cultivate the English, and the third class had better learn English by mixing with English-speaking people. The hon. Member who moved the reduction of the Vote made what appeared to me to be a very extraordinary statement. He said that the teaching of the Irish language would bind the Irish abroad more closely to the Irish at home. No doubt he believed that was an argument, but I could not for the life of me see how it could possibly affect that question. For example, the Irish people who are scattered abroad in America and Australia do not know the Irish language. How the teaching of Irish as their mother tongue to the people of Ireland could draw them closer to the Irish people in America who do not know that language, and never desire or try to learn it, I fail entirely to understand. Indeed, it seems to me the very opposite would be the result. As a matter of fact, very few people in Ireland speak Irish alone. Very few indeed are dependent on the Celtic language, and very few of the peasantry are proud that they speak the two languages. The tendency is rather the other way—rather to deny that they know the Irish language than to admit that they do know it. Since so few people speak the Irish language in Ireland would it not be a monstrous thing to fetter the educational energies of the country by trying to revive a language which, if it once became the sole language, would be of the greatest disadvantage to the people of Ireland in their intercourse with other nations? Wales and the Welsh language have been referred to. But in Wales the Welsh language is spoken by the bulk of the people. Almost every Welsh Member addresses his constituents in Welsh. What Irish Member addresses his constituents in Irish? In Wales it is simply the question of keeping alive a living language, which the bulk of the people and nearly all the educated classes can speak and read; but in Ireland it is the question of reviving a language that is practically dead. You might as well try to make Latin the spoken and living language of Italy along with Italian. This idea of reviving the Irish language is an idle dream. Scholars may explore the treasure-houses of its literature, but it never can and never ought to be the language of the whole people. Lord Russell of Killowen is always a useful man to quote on your side, but he is not useful to quote on the other side. In this particular instance, as he is so strongly on my side, I may refer to a statement he made lately which has been published in all the papers. Speaking at a meeting of the Gaelic League he said the attempt to revive the Irish language was foolish from every possible point of view. My hon. friend asked—Is not this demand reasonable? I say, No, it is not. That is the point on which we differ at the very start. There are many demands which the Irish people could make with regard to education with which I might not be able to agree, and yet I would not say they were unreasonable. It does not seem to me to be a demand that will ever be entertained by the Government. It may be discussed on antiquarian grounds in the House, but it is not one that will ever be carried into force. I think it would be a very bad thing for the people of Ireland. The gentleman who opened this debate said that some of us opposed the Irish language because we thought that if the Irish people were to learn the Irish language Rome would have more power over them. I cannot see how for that reason Rome could have more power over them, seeing that Rome does not know Irish. If Irish were the language of Rome I could understand it. We are not discussing a question of religion, but a question of language on its own merits, no matter how it might bear on any particular cause. It seems to me that one of the best possible tests of sincerity in this matter is to ask, what do hon. Gentlemen opposite do in the case of their own families? What does an educated, enlightened Irish Nationalist do in regard to his own family? That is the test of the whole thing. What has been done in his own education in this matter? The value of a foreign language, especially French, to anyone who has the opportunity of going abroad is immense, and if, though it would not be perhaps practicable, a demand were made by the Irish Nationalists in this House for a further sum in order to encourage the teaching of the French language I would be with them. My hon. and learned friend the Member for South Donegal knows the difficulty which travelling abroad involves. He knows perfectly well that even his immense knowledge of the Celtic language does not serve in the slightest degree. He knows very well how one of his countrymen—shall I say one of his own colleagues?—some time ago wanted to leave his luggage in the cloak-room at a railway station in Italy. This gentleman did not know Italian; he knew simply English and Irish, and a little Latin learned solely in graveyards. He procured the attendance of the station-master by the use of the word generalissimo, which he saw signed to a printed notice, and which he took to mean station-master, and he thought that the intelligent station-master would be so fond of the ancient language of his country that he would understand Latin. The traveller on the arrival of the station-master pointed to his luggage and said "Requiescat in pace," and then, pointing to himself, said "Resurgam." By this device ideas were exchanged—the luggage was "to rest in peace" till the traveller "rose again," or, in less poetic words, "came back to claim it." A little Italian would have been very valuable to the traveller, but not Celtic. In that case the Irishman knew the

Mr. Rentoul.

Celtic language, but not the language of the country he visited. I would advise my hon. friends opposite, instead of demanding to foist an impracticable language on the people, to turn their attention to other matters which would do a great deal more for the people. I would remind them that certain districts to which the hon. Member referred, where the Irish language is almost exclusively spoken, are also the poorest in Ireland. Was that in favour of the Irish language or against it? There are a great many districts in Donegal where a great many people speak the language, but does that save them from the poverty that exists in that country? I would feel myself in a far more happy condition if I were able to support hon. Members from Ireland in something that would be for the good of the country, instead of having to take part in a debate year after year on an entirely worthless and foolish demand by gentlemen very few of whom understand or speak five sentences of the language about which they indulge in a long and empty and ludicrous debate.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I hope hon. Members from Ireland will not object to a Member from another part of the kingdom taking part in the debate for a few moments. The question they have raised is one of very wide and general interest to all parts of the United Kingdom. The question really has absolutely nothing to do with politics. It might have been a political object, or had some political influence and importance sixty or seventy years ago. I believe that Daniel O'Connell used to address large mass meetings in Ireland in the Irish language, and I rather think that the great gathering on the battlefield of Clontarf was to have been so addressed; but we know that now you could not find anybody speaking Irish alone within fifty miles of Clontarf. I do not think any newspapers are published in Irish. [AN HON. MEMBER: There are three newspapers.] Are they daily newspapers? [AN HON. MEMBER: Weekly newspapers.] A weekly newspaper nowadays is apt to be more in the nature of a magazine. There are no daily newspapers, and I have never heard of a vernacular press. [AN HON. MEMBER: Daily papers have columns in Irish.] I am glad to hear that. I was not aware of it. The vernacular press has, at any rate, never been supposed to be in any way a cause of political agitation. The other remark I want to make is that this is not a question of promoting the Irish language at the expense of the English. I do not understand that that is for a moment intended. The whole argument of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has been directed to that point, and is therefore quite irrelevant. I do not think the Chief Secretary supposes that it is intended the teaching of English shall be in any way sacrificed to the teaching of Irish, or that anyone who does not use Irish as the home tongue shall be taught Irish in the schools unless he desires to learn it. It is not suggested that anywhere except in the Irish-speaking districts should the teaching of Irish become a regular part of the school work. Of course, obviously it is for the advantage of the children that they should be able to speak and read and write English. English will open for them a wider career in life than Irish possibly could. I believe that the Welsh Members think—and so far as I know, the Irish Members also think—that English will be positively better taught and understood if taught through Irish. I am not going to argue this question as a matter of national sentiment, or what you would call the sentimental value of language. Personally, I am under the influence of that sentiment. I own that it would seem to me a great misfortune if the ancient Celtic languages were altogether to disappear. I would be sorry to see Irish disappear and should have the same regret were Gaelic or Welsh to vanish. I know that in France there is the same wish not to let the ancient languages die out. There is a desire to keep the Breton and the Basque, and there has been an important revival of Provençal. One of the finest poems France has produced in the last fifty years is a poem, "Mireio," written in the old Provençal language. Therefore there is a great deal to be said for keeping the old language. At the same time I am bound to say with all respect to the distinguished Irish literary man who wrote an interesting letter to The Times a few days ago, that I do not think there is much prospect at this time of day of our succeeding in making the ancient Celtic language a vehicle for modern literature. It is a dangerous experiment to try to turn an ancient classical language into a modern one as respects either syntax or vocabulary. The genius of a modern people is too different from that of the ancients. The experiment has been tried in Greece, and modern Greek is not nearly so natural and self-consistent a language since they have endeavoured to make it classical and to bring in the old classical forms of expression. They would have done better to develop a good modern language out of their Romaic. However, I shall not attempt to argue this question upon these sentimental considerations, because although they appeal to some of us very strongly, and although I have the warmest sense of the splendour, the brilliance, and the imaginative power of the ancient Irish literature, an imaginative quality quite unique, and with a wild charm of the Western sea that is all its own; still I think these are arguments that do not appeal to everyone here; and if we have got a strong practical case—as I believe we have—for teaching the old Celtic languages, I would rather argue it on that basis and put considerations which may appeal to persons like the hon. Member who has just sat down. I come to the practical question, and that is this: can anything be done—usefully and practically done—to meet the demands of the Members from Ireland? My excuse for interfering in the debate is that I once had some experience on this subject. I had, thirty-four years ago, the honour of being assistant commissioner of a Royal Commission which was to examine into the endowed grammar schools of Wales. I had to make inquiry there as to the best way of dealing with a large number of Welsh-speaking boys in order to teach them both English and their own language. The testimony was that you teach English better and stimulate the general intelligence more if you use Welsh as well as English in the teaching, and if you teach Welsh as a cultivated language side by side with English. I dare say some of the Welsh Members present can give in their own experience a better illustration of this than I can. However, the Welsh clergymen and schoolmasters whom I consulted were all agreed that the bilingual system not only taught the children English better, but was useful in other respects. It is easy to see why that should be so, because when you take a child and begin to teach it another language in addition to its own language the child is obliged to transfer thought from one set of words to another, and in doing so is obliged to get a much more exact idea of the meaning of words, of the genius of a language, and of the nature of the transference of thought than it is possible to get in one language only. That is what we all do in learning Latin. We are obliged to turn our thoughts which we form in English into the form which the same thoughts would take in a different language, and that is one reason why I think no kind of instruction is more valuable than the writing of Latin prose, and the same thing applies in the case of English and Irish. Now I come to the hon. Member for East Down, who asked why we should begin to teach children a language which might be of no use to them. He asked whether there were any countries in Europe where the people speak two languages. Why, it is hard to find a country in Europe in which there are not many people using two languages.

MR. RENTOUL : I said the mechanics and working classes.

MR. BRYCE : There are a great many parts of Europe where the working classes speak two languages. In Belgium a large number of people of the humbler class speak Flemish and French ; in Denmark a large part of the peasantry speak German as well as Danish, and in France many of the population speak two languages. In Germany there are large districts where the national language of the population is Slav, but where many also speak German, and it is the same all through the Austrian Empire. In Hungary and Croatia and Dalmatia there is a large bilingual population.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR : And in the Italian Alps.

MR. BRYCE : And as my right hon. friend reminds me, it is the same all through the valleys of the western part of the Italian Alps, where both French and Italian are spoken. The same thing is also true in Spain.

MR. RENTOUL : And Yorkshire.

MR. BRYCE : If the hon. Member thinks that the language of Catalonia or Galicia differs no more from classical

Mr. Bryce.

Castilian than the Yorkshire speech differs from classical English, he is much mistaken. The hon. Member for East Down says he cannot see why two languages should be taught when English is the language to be used. I would remind the hon. Member that the proposal is to teach English through the medium of the native language. The question is whether you should not make the best possible use of their native language. The hon. Member's idea is that you ought to teach English through English, which means that you are to address a child in a language which he does not understand. The truth is that it is a great piece of good fortune in training the minds of children that they should have a language already which they can use to enable them to compare the English, and they will not learn English any more slowly or any less thoroughly if they are taught it through Irish than if that language is neglected. Irish ought to be taught not as a vernacular, but as a literary language. You ought to have reading books in Irish, and the children ought to be accustomed to translate the Irish reading books into English and vice versa. In the training colleges in Scotland and in Wales special instruction is given to the teachers who are going to teach in the districts where Welsh or Gaelic is the common tongue to enable them to use Gaelic or Welsh as the vehicle of instruction. This ought to be done in Ireland also. I submit, therefore, that the demand which the Irish Members make is a very reasonable and moderate demand. As for Celtic philology, that is rather a matter for higher secondary schools and universities, but I may point out that the larger the number of people to whom instruction is given in Irish, the more prospect is there that in after life some of them will avail themselves of it to study the language scientifically and to make use of the abundant and rich materials which exist for the study of ancient Irish history and Irish literature, materials which have been very sparingly and inadequately used so far. Many years ago I happened to spend a summer vacation in Ireland, where I obtained lessons in Irish—lessons which, to my regret, I have now forgotten—from the son of an Irish peasant who had developed a remarkable talent for philology, and who at that time promised to become—(he died long ago, before that promise could be fulfilled)—one of the ablest philologists in the United Kingdom. The instance of that man makes me believe that if we were to give the Irish-speaking population a chance of studying Irish as a literary language we might have a much larger number of persons studying Irish history and literature; and I think that it is an object with which everybody in this House who takes an interest in history and literature, whether he be an Irishman or not, will deeply sympathise. I must apologise for having detained the House so long, but without venturing to express an opinion upon the precise rules which ought to be made to meet the wishes of the Irish Members, I do think that they have made out a case for a much wider teaching of Irish than now exists, and I would suggest to the Chief Secretary that he should go fully into the subject. I think we are particularly fortunate in having a Chief Secretary who is himself a man of high literary ability and attainments, and who has, I feel sure, every sympathy with the study of Irish literature. If the right hon. Gentleman feels any doubt as to the best way in which this can be done, I hope that he will refer it for inquiry to those who have practical knowledge of the subject either in Wales or in Scotland, who are themselves men of educational experience, and that he will endeavour to induce the Commissioners to frame a scheme which will go far to meet the complaints made to-day, and thus turn the opportunities which Ireland offers in this matter to far better account.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I find myself in such distinct agreement with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that I have hardly any criticism to offer to his very valuable contribution to the debate, except in one particular. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has fully realised the nature and extent of the demand which has been made. The hon. Member for Waterford began his speech by saying that the whole future of the Irish race was bound up in this question. I think that statement alone will indicate to the right hon. Gentleman that he has somewhat minimised what is now being asked for. I think the right hon. Gentleman will hardly be prepared to say that this is a question involving the whole future of the Irish race. The reason why the hon.

Member for Waterford dwells so much upon this question, involving the future of the Irish race, is because he believes that the large mass of the children in Ireland speak the native language. When the hon. Member for Waterford quoted statistics upon this point, I interrupted him in the middle of his speech, because I thought the numbers which he gave to the Committee on this subject were extremely misleading. I have here an extract from the Report of the Census Commissioners of Ireland. From table 155 it will be seen that in 1881, 64,167 persons were returned as speaking Irish only, and that in 1891 the number so returned was 38,121, or 26,046 less than in 1881; also, that in 1881 the number of persons returned as able to speak Irish and English was 885,765, and that in 1891 it was 642,053, or 243,712 less than in 1881. It is perfectly clear that if the number of children affected by the changes asked for is confined to Irish-speaking districts it will not be anything like what the hon. Member for Waterford appears to imagine. The problem is not, therefore, such a very extensive one, and it must also be remembered that the numbers are diminishing at a very rapid rate. What, then, is the existing state of affairs? Since 1883 there has been a note in the Code of the Irish Commissioners which declares that where there are Irish-speaking pupils in the school a teacher acquainted with the Irish language should, wherever practicable, be employed, and that inspectors are at liberty to employ the vernacular if they think it desirable to do so. That note has been in the Code ever since 1883, and if it be true that, notwithstanding that, a knowledge of English has not been imparted through the vernacular, I think the managers must bear the larger share of the blame. The teachers are not appointed by the Board of Education, but by the managers, and, so far as I can see, there is really nothing in the old Code or in the new rules which have lately been issued to prevent the teaching of English through Irish. The hon. Member for Connemara has complained of the constitution of the Board of Education, but if anyone looks at the list of names upon that Board he will see that it includes some of the most distinguished men in Ireland, and for the hon. Member for Connemara to say that he does not know more than three or four of them is to argue himself unknown. If it be true that there is nothing to prevent bilingual teaching, we must hold that if there is any difficulty about it it is largely due to the fact that the matter has not been pressed at all because the managers do not care about it, or because they were not able to find teachers who could speak Irish. I now come to the question of what it is that is being really asked for. It is very important that we should answer this question very clearly and precisely. I think that the speech of the hon. Member for Waterford threw a certain ambiguity over the question as to what the demand really was. If I am to judge from the pamphlet sent to me by the Gaelic League, the demands which are made are—

“(1) That in all places where Irish is the home language pupils shall be taught to read and write Irish from their first entrance into the school, and that a knowledge of English and other useful subjects shall be imparted through the medium of Irish.”

That is the point to which my right hon. friend the Member for South Aberdeen alludes. The second demand is—

“That in all places where Irish is not the home language it shall be lawful to teach Irish as a remunerated subject within school hours, and at the earliest stage at which children are capable of learning it.”

Now if Irish under that Code was a remunerated subject it would become a compulsory subject, and it means that wherever the managers in either an English or an Irish-speaking district think fit Irish might be made a compulsory subject. We ought, therefore, to keep these two demands strictly apart. As regards the first demand, which asks for something which now exists in Wales, I cannot see any great harm in it; on the contrary, I think from the educational point of view we ought to grant it, for I believe it would have good results. I entirely agree with all that has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen upon that point. The hon. Member for East Down gave a very misleading analogy when he said that when anyone went abroad in order to learn a foreign language he was careful to go into a country where only its own language was spoken. But a man travelling abroad for this purpose is very different from poor ignorant children going to school. So far, then, I find myself quite in agreement with the demand put forward, and I believe that it would be better for the English itself that it be taught through Irish. As I have already said, I do not think that there is anything in the rules of the Commissioners, either in the new rules or the old rules, which would preclude this from being done. In the new rules there is nothing of a positive character upon this subject, and if the Commissioners see fit to propose a rule of a more positive character assimilating the rules in Irish-speaking districts to those in Welsh-speaking districts I should not oppose it. But as far as I am concerned, I have no actual power in the matter beyond making suggestions, and I cannot promise whether they will accept my suggestions or not. I may point out that Irish is now, and will be in the future, an extra subject taught out of school hours, and I think that is a very desirable thing, and I should be very sorry to see it omitted. The hon. Member for Waterford has spoken of a strong national feeling in favour of a revival of Irish in order that it may become the national language of Ireland.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I did not say that at all.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I thought the hon. Member's remarks tended in that direction, but if I am wrong I apologise. If it is to be suggested that Irish should be a compulsory subject, whether in Irish-speaking districts or not, as far as I can see, the result would be to re-create Irish as the national language of Ireland. That I believe to be an impossibility, and I am not prepared to encourage it. Notwithstanding the numerous resolutions of public bodies and the expression of opinion from the benches opposite, I wish to point out that there is not in any private schools a real demand for the teaching of Irish as a compulsory subject. I do not find on the part of parents who send their children to secondary schools a demand that Irish should be compulsory. In the higher colleges in Ireland is Irish a compulsory subject? I can find absolutely no trace of anything of the kind. Take the case of Queen's College, Galway. In 1897-98 there was only one student who attended the lectures on Irish; in 1898-99 nobody attended, and no one has attended this session. The fact is that there is no real, genuine, spontaneous desire in Ireland to revive Irish as the national language. I am glad of this, for it would be a retrograde step, doomed to failure. These remarks I merely make by the way, because it seems to me that the important question, after all, is whether it is desirable that the bilingual system should be applied also to Ireland. Personally I have no objection to bilingual teaching in Gaelic districts, although I foresee great difficulties in the way of providing teachers competent to instruct in the vernacular. I do not think, however, that very much time should be spent upon teaching children to write Irish, but I hold that where Irish is the home language it would be better that instruction in that language should be given.

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I do not think that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is satisfactory. Although he has declared himself in favour of the first part of our proposal, I may point out that he did not tell us of any means by which his sympathy can be carried into effect. It is idle to throw upon the managers the responsibility for not having this bilingual system of teaching put into force. The whole scheme is devised upon lines which render it impossible for school managers to get teachers who can teach that system. There is not one word in the curriculum to compel teachers to learn Irish, and no reward is offered to them for doing so. The whole question is absolutely ignored in the training colleges. What we want to know is whether the Commissioners of Education are going to encourage the teachers to learn Irish, and to impart a knowledge of Irish to such pupils as may desire to learn it. I do not want to make any attack upon the Commissioners of National Education, and I do not agree with the attacks which have been made upon them. I believe the Commissioners are being hampered by other difficulties, and the reason why they have not a better system is the fault of the Government. I know the gentleman who presides over the National Board would never have delivered the speech he did upon the question of teaching Irish if he had not the assent of his colleagues, and if he had not believed that his words might have some effect when the rules were revised. I do not share the view that there is no strong national demand in Ireland in connection with this question. In my opinion no movement has made such progress during the last ten or twelve years as the teaching of the Irish language. I remember when it was a rare thing in the city of Dublin to hear a man speaking Irish; now it is common to hear men conversing in Irish, who learned it either by their own industry or through some Gaelic association, and without having had any particular assistance from any educational source. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the fact that no attention seemed to be given to the teaching of Irish in the colleges in Ireland. But how can Irish be taught in the colleges if you do not begin with the junior pupils in the primary schools? Surely it is not at college that the study of Irish should be commenced, and it is not likely that any number will devote themselves to Irish when no inducement of any kind is held out to them. The right hon. Gentleman throws the responsibility on the managers of schools for not having teachers who can teach in Irish in the Irish-speaking districts, but I know very well that managers would be extremely glad if they were able to get teachers who would be able to teach children through the medium of Irish. But they are restricted to teachers trained under the National Board. They have no choice. The moment a manager appoints a teacher not classed by the National Board the grant to the school ceases. The managers have not a free hand, and there is no endeavour made by the Commissioners to prepare teachers in Irish, which is the natural language of a great proportion of the people. I have been in districts in the west of Kerry where you could not find half a dozen persons who could speak English. I have seen the children in the schools, and it was positively painful to hear them reading pages of English not one word of which they understood, and then the moment they found themselves in the playground they addressed each other in Irish. These children could not explain what they were reading, and if you addressed them in English they would not understand what was said. Surely the Commissioners cannot contend that they are carrying out the trust placed in them as long as there is a large number of children in such a condition as that. I would say that the hon. Member for East Down was in himself a deplorable example of what the system of national education can do in Ireland, for there was neither sentiment, nor soul, nor nationality in his speech. He might have belonged to any nationality in the world. Education from his point of view is education that will enable a person to get on in the world, and which has neither traditions, nor memories, nor sentiment, nor soul. The hon. Member spoke of its being a disadvantage to the children to be taught anything at all of their own natural language, and, according to him, it would be better if they were transferred to a portion of the country where they could speak only English. That is not the view of persons who have studied this question, and that is not the opinion of the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman was sympathetic, and we could expect nothing more from him, so far as giving an expression of opinion, than we had from him this evening; but a mere pious expression of opinion on the part of the National Board that English may be taught through the medium of Irish will have no practical result unless an effort is made to provide that that opinion is carried out. The teachers must be prepared, and there must be some inducement held out to them to learn Irish. It is not a remunerated subject now, and the teacher is supposed to be such an enthusiastic lover of the Irish language that when the work for which he is paid is done, and when his duty to the State and his pupils is discharged, he will gather the pupils around him and deliver his soul to them in Irish. The teachers must have an extraordinary amount of enthusiasm and zeal if they take up this subject after their ordinary work is done. Surely the National Board ought to be able to devise some means to reward teachers for a knowledge of Irish in districts where it is essential for carrying out their work. Then, as to the other demand, I would inform the Chief Secretary that he entirely misapprehends the position if he thinks that the Gaelic League or any hon. Member in this House has the slightest intention of displacing English and getting the people of Ireland to speak Irish only. Lunacy has not increased to that extent. What we demand is that in districts where the children hear nothing but Irish in their homes they should be taught English through the medium of Irish, and that in addition to teaching them English some effort should be made at the same time to give them a literary knowledge of the Irish language. The Chief Secretary spoke of placing schools in Ireland in the same position as schools in Wales as regards the national language. He will not do that by a mere expression of opinion, or by a mere permissive authority on the part of the National Board, that if teachers know Irish, and can teach it, the Board have no objection. We want something more. We want the books in use in the schools in Irish-speaking districts to be Irish books, just as in Wales the school books are in Welsh. The National Board know perfectly well that the note they have placed in their Code can have no effect. Teachers will not devote their time to teaching Irish after ordinary hours without pay or reward. That is not putting us in the same position as Wales. Welsh is a remunerated subject in Welsh schools, and the school-books are printed in both Welsh and English. Let the right hon. Gentleman place us in that position, and the whole of our demand will be conceded.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flintshire Boroughs): Frequent reference has been made in the course of this debate to Welsh experience, and perhaps, therefore, it may not be unbecoming for a Welsh Member to say a few words on this question. I would venture to say that all my hon. friends from Wales heartily concur in the reasonable and moderate request which has been put forward by the Irish Members. The Chief Secretary has, I think, exaggerated to some extent the nature of the demand that has been made. I will not enter into the question whether his assurances are sufficiently satisfactory; that is a question for the Irish Members; but I am heartily glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman does intend practically to apply to Ireland the system that prevails in Wales, and that should prevail in Ireland also.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: All that the Irish Government can do in the matter is to suggest the change to the Commissioners, and to sanction it when it is proposed.

MR. LEWIS: I can only hope, then, that the Commissioners will take the same enlightened view of the question that the right hon. Gentleman takes, and that his great influence will be used to introduce into Ireland a similar system to that of Wales. As far as the Welsh system is concerned, we can speak in the highest terms of the success that has attended it. The Welsh language is an admirable educational instrument. The difference in idiom, construction, and forms of expression are much greater between the Welsh and English languages than between English and French or German, and it adds enormously to the mental culture of a child to be taught a language which is as essentially different from English as is Greek or Latin. The fact is that modern European languages are too much on the same plan; but when we come to the Celtic languages the difference between them and the Teutonic languages is so immense that they improve very greatly the mental faculties of the children who study them. I might quote the Report of the Central Board of Education in Wales in confirmation of that view, which states that the bilingual training involved in the parallel study of two languages so dissimilar as English and Welsh must be of marked value to the pupils. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the fact that Irish was not largely taught in the colleges and universities of Ireland. I will tell him why. The hon. Member who spoke last offered a perfectly adequate explanation of that. You do not begin at the bottom, and you cannot expect this kind of instruction to come from the top. We have Welsh taught in our elementary schools in Wales, and we have it taught now, not only in the intermediate schools, but also in the university. I may mention also a fact that may be of interest to hon. Gentlemen, that Welsh is even recognised in the local examinations of Cambridge University as a specific subject. Looked at simply from the point of view of its educational value, one could not possibly find for Welsh children a better vehicle of instruction than their own tongue, and I see no reason why the same process should not apply in every respect to the Irish language. The hon. Member for East Down asked hon. Members from Ireland on this side of the House whether they taught their own children the Irish language. All I can say in regard to that is that twenty or thirty years ago in Wales the Welsh language was considered a rather unfashionable and even a vulgar language, and people in the upper ranks of society were rather more ashamed of it than otherwise. What is the case at present? Why, peers and M.P.'s and people belonging to other ranks of society take the greatest care to have their children taught the language of the country. Well would it be if that were the case in Ireland; because, after all, the language of a country is one of the shortest ways to the hearts of its people. A few weeks ago I travelled in Brittany, and in diligence and railway carriage I often conversed in the Breton language as far as I could. The Welsh and Breton languages are much more similar than the Welsh and Irish languages, and by conversing in the Breton language I found my way at once to the hearts of the people. Their faces lighted up with interest and admiration when they found a foreigner speaking a language which they supposed was their own, but which was the language of a country beyond the seas as well. I saw in a leading journal this morning the following statement—

“To provide for the efficient teaching of Irish in the Ireland of the present day would be to subsidise the study of a dead language under great difficulties and without any of the advantages of the cultivation of classical literature.”

The gentlemen who write for the newspaper from which I have quoted are all men of great ability and great culture, but there was never a greater mistake than to say that the Irish language is a dead language. I hope it is no more a dead language than is Welsh. Perhaps we in Wales have had certain advantages. Our Sunday schools have kept the Welsh language alive, and at the present time a larger number of people speak it than in any previous period in the history of Wales, and a greater number can speak it and write it grammatically than ever before. I should like to refer to another statement in the newspaper from which I have already quoted. It is as follows—

“Neither in Wales nor in Brittany have the consequences of fostering the Celtic dialects been such as to encourage enlightened men to labour for the artificial creation of a similar state of things in Ireland.”

I will tell the House how the Welsh language was “fostered” early in this century, and, I believe, also very considerably into the latter half of the century. It was the custom in Wales to give what was called a "token"—a very heavy wooden billet—to a boy who spoke the Welsh language in a day school, and he was obliged to carry it on his back as a token of disgrace until he had found some other boy who had broken into the Welsh language also, and then it was transferred to him. I know perfectly well that the Irish language has been discouraged in similar and, perhaps, more cruel ways than that in the past, but I think we have now arrived at a state of things when the Philistinism which Mathew Arnold denounced so fiercely is passing away. We have now arrived at a more enlightened state, and we now recognise that the languages of the smaller nations have their part to play in the economy of the world, and that it is not right to trample them out of existence. I think the Irish child ought to be taught to respect the language of his hearth and home, and ought to obtain a grammatical and literary knowledge of that language. It is true we have in Wales a large number of magnificent publications in the Welsh language, £200,000 worth of Welsh books being published every year, and so far as modern literature is concerned, undoubtedly we will not yield the palm to any branch of the Celtic race. But in ancient literature we must acknowledge that Ireland is richer than most countries, although little is known of it at the present time, and even that little is only known to the cultured few. I hope the day is not far distant when every Irish child will be taught his own language in his own elementary school and will be able to read the classics of his own land, and then we may see Irish scholars taking a deeper interest in their own language and conferring fresh honours on it. I did not intend to trespass so far on the patience of the Committee, but I must say I was to some degree inspired by the magnificent peroration of the hon. Member for Waterford. After all, a language is a precious possession of a country. I put it to English Members, supposing the English language was in the same position, supposing, instead of being the language of the world, it was the language only of the Home Counties; does any one suppose that they would not cling to it, although it was only the language of the few, and perhaps of the despised few? There are other than mere material considerations. You cannot measure everything by a cash value, but you can attach even a cash value to the training of the mind, and believing as I do that the study of the Celtic language by the children who speak it in their homes is a valuable method of training the mind, I heartily support the motion.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): We have all listened with great interest and pleasure to the speech of the hon. Member. For Irishmen it is a great thing to know that there is at all events one part of the world in which the Celtic tongue is so cherished and so vigorous. The statement of the hon. Member about the punishment inflicted on the Welsh children in days gone by for speaking their own language comes quite home to us, because not so long ago children in Ireland who spoke Irish were immediately punished. The speech of the Chief Secretary was, on the whole, unsatisfactory. I have no fault to find with its tone, and I have no intention of falling foul with the right hon. Gentleman on that score. But his speech was exactly the same sort of speech to which we have listened for years. This question of the encouragement of the Irish language has been raised on these benches as long as I can remember, and although the present Chief Secretary was a little more conciliatory and slightly more sympathetic in his remarks, his speech was exactly the same as the speeches of his predecessors. It leads to nothing of a practical nature. The right hon. Gentleman tells us he sympathises with us. We are much obliged to him. Then he tells us he has no power to give practical effect to his sympathy; that he has no power to deal with the Commissioners or to make any change whatever in the scheme under which education in Ireland is administered. I think the right hon. Gentleman has a very easy way of giving effect to his good wishes. All he need do is to bring in a Bill making the encouragement of the Irish language in the Irish schools not only permissive but compulsory. If the right hon. Gentleman would bring in such a Bill even at the present period of the session, I can promise him it would be passed in three days. Therefore there is no ground for the attitude which the right hon. Gentleman has taken up. The right hon. Gentleman laid some share of blame for the condition of the Irish language in Ireland on the attitude of the managers of Irish schools. As far as I know, there is no body of men more anxious that Irish should be properly taught in the Irish schools than the managers. The Irish hierarchy, who I presume may be trusted to speak for the Irish managers, have emphatically pronounced the opinion that the Irish language ought to be encouraged. Not many days ago we saw an interesting statement signed by the managers of National schools in Connaught, in which they unanimously expressed the desire that the Irish language should be encouraged in the National schools, and in my own constituency the managers are also unanimously in favour of this movement. So far as the managers are concerned, the right hon. Gentleman would find no difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that there is nothing in the rules of the Board of Education to prevent the study of the Irish language. The great difficulty, in my mind, is that, under the old rules, and still more under the new, there is no inducement given to Irish teachers to teach the Irish language in their schools. They are supposed to teach it out of school hours, and they get no remuneration for it. That is much worse than no system at all. The right hon. Gentleman made a strong point when he said that educated people in Ireland do not insist on their children being taught Irish. Well, the reason of that is exceedingly simple. There is no opportunity for teaching children of the upper classes in Ireland Irish, and no assistance is given by the Government for teaching Irish in the lower schools; and under the intermediate system the study of Irish is not encouraged. The result is that there are practically no grammars and other books for teaching Irish. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned, as an instance of the small interest taken in the Irish language, that there was only one student of Irish in Queen's College, Galway. That case is an unfortunate one, because the right hon. Gentleman knows that very few Catholics in Ireland will send their children to be educated in Queen's Colleges. The right hon. Gentleman has reiterated his sympathy with this question, but I hope he will go further, and, instead of having it brought up year after year in this extremely unsatisfactory fashion, that next year he will be in a position to introduce a measure, supposing the National Education Board do not take proper steps meanwhile, to encourage the study of the Irish language. I have no cause of complaint for the very cautious manner in which the right hon. Gentleman gave us some of the reasons for the faith that is in him. He told us it was monstrous to attempt to revive a dead language. Thank God, Irish is not yet a dead language, although at the present moment it is in danger; and that is one of the reasons why the Irish Members want some means taken by which it will never become a dead language. The point which the right hon. Gentleman overlooked, and which is persistently overlooked in this House, is that the people of Ireland are determined that the Irish language shall be assisted, and as far as possible revived. This is a repetition of the whole question of ninety-nine years ago, that the people are determined to be governed in accordance with their own wishes. The people of Ireland are unanimous in their desire for the revival of the Irish language, and no matter what arguments, based on so-called justice and common sense, may be brought against us, we are determined to maintain our position. I am not, however, afraid to meet hon. Gentlemen on the grounds of practical common sense. One hon. Gentleman asked whether there was any country in Europe where more than one language was spoken by working men. There are, as a matter of fact, so many countries in Europe where they speak two languages, that the difficulty is to find a country where only one is spoken. The hon. Gentleman was particularly unfortunate in his reference to Switzerland, because in most districts in that country two languages are spoken by all the people, and in many, three. In the neighbouring country of France, in every single Department, two languages, at least, are spoken. In fact, there are more patois and dialects spoken in France than in any other country in the world. For instance, in the South, Bernaise and French are spoken; in the West, Breton and French; in the East, German and French in Alsace-Lorraine; in the North-East, Walloon and French.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.):
Are these taught in the schools?

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I never was at a school there, and I cannot tell; but I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can say, of his own knowledge, that they are not. I go to Belgium, where I have lived, and there Flemish is taught in the schools in the same way as French—the two languages go on side by side. Then take the case of Hungary, which is peculiarly interesting, because we Irish are constantly reminded that there is so much that is generally characteristic in the history of the two countries. In different parts of Hungary Magyar and German are spoken; Magyar and Roumanian, Magyar and Polish, Magyar and Russian, Magyar and Czech, Magyar and Croat, and in every one of these districts they get on extremely well with the two languages. Another point in connection with Hungary is of extreme interest, and that is that not so very long ago, not two generations ago, the Hungarian language was forbidden, and the official language of the Diet and the courts of law was Latin; and if any other language was spoken it was either German, Wallachian, or a Slav dialect. The Hungarians fought the battle of their language in the same way as they fought their political battles, and now all over Hungary Magyar is spoken, although seventy or eighty years ago it was said to be a dead language. An hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House talked of the difficulty of reviving a dead language, but the great advantage in regard to Irish is that it is not a dead language. It is spoken by, at all events, half a million of people in Ireland, and there is no difficulty whatever in preserving it, if the Government will only give us some small assistance. I am very sorry to say that I cannot speak Irish myself. I have not had the opportunity of learning it, as I do not come from an Irish-speaking district; but I take a great interest in this question on literary, historical, and national grounds. I do not suppose that the last of these grounds commends itself to our opponents. But I represent a constituency where there is a very large Irish-speaking population, and I should be wanting in my duty to them if I did not intervene in this debate in behalf of the Irish language. The Chief Secretary objects to the programme laid before him by the Gaelic League. He says it is too extensive, and not of a practical nature; but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the League speaks for the people of Ireland. The sentiment which is behind the Gaelic League, and from which they derive their great influence, is spread all over the country, and is daily increasing in strength and volume. Their first proposal is that there should be the teaching of the Irish language in the Irish-speaking districts. The right hon. Gentleman agrees to that, although he says that he has no power to give effect to it. But I hope he will discover before next session some way of giving effect to it. The other proposal is that Irish should be made worthy of study by the teachers in the Irish schools, so that they might be better fitted to teach it to their pupils, and that they should be given an opportunity of teaching it to pupils in other than Irish-speaking districts. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not adopted a more sympathetic attitude in regard to that point. I think it will not be necessary, at the present stage, that the teaching of Irish should be made compulsory in the non-Irish-speaking districts; but the people of Ireland have a fair right to claim that when they wish their children to learn Irish they should get teachers qualified to instruct them. I do not think that is an impossible demand. I would like to reassure the right hon. Gentleman that this is not a question with which, after all, the people of Ireland do not feel sympathy. It is emphatically a national question, and representatives of every school of politics and creeds have expressed themselves in favour of it, from the hierarchy down to boards of guardians. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should consider this matter seriously, as a question which recommends itself to the Government on grounds of policy, if for no other reason. It is a question that can very easily be settled, and it would be judicious and wise on the part of the Government to do so. All we ask is similarity of treatment with the other parts of the United Kingdom, and that the principles of Unionism should be put in force. Before the last general election we heard a great deal about the equality of treatment of all parts of the United Kingdom, but we did not hear so much about it afterwards. Another election is approaching, and the Government should give some proof of their desire to afford equality of treatment in Ireland with that of the people in Wales and in the Highlands of Scotland." The people in Ireland will be very easily satisfied on this point. Probably there may be some trouble in certain parts of Ireland, unless some steps are taken to meet the feelings of the people in this matter. At all events, the feeling is strong enough to make the carrying on of the National School system a matter of difficulty, unless the teaching of the Irish language is conceded. I appeal to the right hon. gentleman, however, on much higher grounds than that. The government of the British Empire is committed to many educated and intellectual men, and no higher duty can fall upon them than the encouragement of the mental training and culture of those over whom they rule. Behind this question of the Irish language there remains that of cultivating the minds of the Irish people by enabling them to enjoy the beauties of their historic literature, their poetry, and their native traditions. On these high, and perhaps ideal, grounds it is the duty of the Government to support the teaching of the Irish language. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the English Government has in other countries done very much to encourage and preserve native languages. In New Zealand the Maori language would have died out long ago had it not been for the action of the representatives of the British Government, who had books published in the Maori language, and the Maoris were taught to read and write in their own tongue. The same may be said of the language of Samoa, and many other places which, either permanently or temporarily, have been brought under the British Government. Surely if it was worth while to preserve the language and literature of the Maoris it is much more worth while to preserve the language and literature of Ireland. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman once again that this is a most important question, that there is an immense amount of popular feeling for it, and that it would be wise for the Government to concede something to that feeling.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is a rule that when any question is brought forward by the Irish Members and resisted by the Government, that resistance is based either on the ground that the demand will cost money, or that the result will have some effect on the Act of Union. Now, Nationalists in Ireland, or most of them, can already speak English, and they detest the system of English government quite heartily enough already, so that it cannot be suggested that a knowledge of the English language or acquaintance with the abuse which is cast on the name and fame of Ireland, on its literature and its religion, has in any way increased the attachment of Irishmen to the system of government established in that country. Consequently it is absurd to suggest that any further culture or extension of the knowledge of Irish would in any way militate against the continuance of the existence of that system. So that we may dismiss from our minds the idea that the Government would receive any help for their case from the fact that the Irish speak English. Indeed I can conceive that if we only used the Irish language our detestation of the English would never have been half so great as it is, because we could never have understood what was said. I take as an instance of the reason which exists for our detestation the sentiment expressed in the speech of the hon. and learned Member for East Down. As I understood him he put his case altogether on the fact that English is a practical language, and that what we have to do with is the practical affairs of this life; and in hard and bitter language he complained that we and our teachers encouraged nothing but sentiment. I am always glad to get information, and I bow before the pundit opposite; but, if there is a great deal of practical advantage to be got from the knowledge of the English language, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman is so much better equipped in that respect than our poor selves, why should he not turn his great genius to some better account than looking for an English County Court judgeship? We always find the Government putting up on these occasions some one to express their real sentiments who is on the cadge for a job. The line taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman, who is used on every occasion as the merest utensil of the Government, and who is put up as a so-called independent Member to express his own opinions, but who, of course, speaks the real sentiments of the Government, is really one of the reasons why I say the knowledge of English possessed by Irish Members occasionally adds to our detestation of the established system of government in Ireland. Even so, the fact that the hon. Gentleman's English is so admirable, is supported by his statement that nothing was more valued by him in his domestic home and in the educational circumstances of his home, than "The Spelling-book Superseded." As I thought, that was the measure of the Philistinism of the hon. and learned Member. As a vehicle of knowledge, of learning, and of the higher thought, the hon. and learned Gentleman recommends to all his friends and following the constant use of "The Spelling-book Superseded"! He has told us that Irish was absolutely unknown abroad. I will not go back to the days of the Comarba, who made the Irish tongue familiar from Norway in the North to the Mediterranean in the South. There are names in Norway of churches called after Irish saints; and Irish saints are venerated in every little hamlet in Germany, France, and Italy. I will not go back to these ancient days, but I will come to a later period when French generals and the Emperor Napoleon found no difficulty but great value in using a few words of the Irish language, especially when they were backed up by the bayonets of the Connaught Rangers. No doubt the Irish language was necessary in South Africa when the Irish Fusiliers sprang to their heroic deeds. At all events, we are living in the year in which we have been graciously permitted, both for ourselves and our soldiers, by Her Majesty the Queen to wear the shamrock; and we have been favoured in the same year by the gracious visit of Her Majesty to Ireland. That has not cost the English a single halfpenny; and in a similar economic frame of mind it would not have added the burden of one sixpence to the Educational Estimates of this country if the demand now asked for from these Irish Benches had been granted. I think I have demonstrated two facts—first, that the knowledge of English does not increase the love of English Government in Ireland; and, second, that the teaching of Irish to the children of Ireland would not add to the expense of the English Government. There is no expense attached to that demand. How, therefore, can you on that ground resist a proposal put forward in the name of at least three-fourths of the people of Ireland? Supposing the Government were dealing with an island in the southern seas which they were anxious to retain, and they found the entire people of that island had put forward an humble demand that they should be allowed to use their tongue, which was in sympathy with the religion and sentiment of the country, would anyone say it would not be wise on the part of the Home Government to consent and tolerate it? Take Jersey, where the French language is still spoken in all its native purity, and where the French language is taught in the schools at the expense of the local rates. Would it not be considered madness if the Government which is established there adopted the same attitude towards the people of the Channel Islands as that which is taken up by certain persons here? I think that attitude is especially injurious upon the part of those who come from districts which would not be affected by this demand. Why should they raise any objection with regard to us? They say it is for our good, and that we should be wasting our time. Surely if we want to waste our time it is no affair of theirs. We do not take any money out of their pockets. We leave them in the enjoyment of the "Spelling-book Superseded." Why they should desire that the bishops of Ireland should be flouted, or that the people of Connemara, Donegal, or Kerry should be deprived of the knowledge of their ancient tongue, I leave to the wisdom of greater men than I. I was in Donegal some little time ago, and I heard children reading English, and they could read it perfectly; but when I asked them the meaning of the commonest words they did not understand them—they did not even understand the "Spelling-book Superseded," and the British Government, forsooth, maintains that system of education as if it was in some way appropriate to bolster up the Act of Union. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said—and I think it was somewhat mean for a man of his talents—"We throw no obstacle in the way." Quite so; but what does he do? He further says, "It is not any fault of ours at all; it is the fault of the school managers." The managers do not pick out whom they choose to teach the children. This was the system which the Catholics established for themselves. They established Catholic colleges for the training of teachers, and the Protestants have done the same thing; and then the true instinct of the Presbyterians, which is to pay nothing if it can be avoided, was discovered, and it is they who are really running the whole show. The training college for teachers in Dublin at the present moment is the training college for the Presbyterians. The right hon. Gentleman having established that system, and having provided that the teachers shall have no training in Irish, and shall not have the means of getting hold of it, and as the school manager must take one of these men who are called "classed," says, "You can get whom you like." It is nonsense; we demand something more. It is something to bewail in any country that one should not know the meaning of the names of the rivers and town lands and common things which affect the life and history of the country, more especially when in many places—and not only places, but personal names—the easier and shorter names have been changed and demoralised into what they now are. May I ask this of the bread-and-butter test Gentlemen: do you not teach Anglo-Saxon in one of your colleges? I understand that there is in one even a chair for Sanscrit, but I am not aware that anybody now asks for tea and sugar in Sanscrit. That, I understand, is the new test, but I wish to put it on a higher level than a question of a tea and sugar policy. It is a portion of the national life of the country, and it is a loss by the people of Irish music through the loss of their native language. Irish music has perished among the Irish people because it was set to Irish songs, which were sung at the fireside, and when the language of the land passed away there were no English words set to this music. We know a great deal about Irish music, but supposing Moore had not written three-fourths of the songs, Irish music would have disappeared. Does the Government owe Ireland no compensation for having destroyed her music, her monasteries, and her woollen manufactures? I do not suggest it even as a matter of sentiment, but as a matter of right. We do not ask for a costly thing, we do not ask for an additional bawbee; but is it not worth while to placate the sentiment of the country? It is not a case which assails the Nonconformist conscience; it is not like the great University question—there is no undue contact with Rome. There is no going back to what have been called the glorious days before the Union. I wonder sometimes that the English do not feel that this is their duty. Irish Members are constantly told that this is a Unionist Parliament, and that in all things in connection with local affairs this Parliament is willing to give them absolute satisfaction. We do not ask for the time of Parliament; we do not ask for a Treasury Bill, or any other which would occupy five minutes consideration. The whole thing could be done by a rule which does not even require Parliamentary sanction. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said—and this is what makes the British Government a matter so hard to explain—that he was not responsible; it was all the National Board. What is that Board? In the first place, in a country three-fourths Catholic, the constitution of the Board requires that half the members should be Protestants. One would imagine that the Government, having put down its hand, would say that the National Board should be in consonance with the complexion of the country; but they first stuff the Board with half their own kind, Protestants, and then they bring in a few weak-kneed Catholics as stuffing for the others. There was a vacancy upon the Board, and, as I said yesterday, there was a scheme to fill that vacancy with a judge, and they put in Mr. Justice Gibson.

Mr. T. M. Healy.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: That was not our doing; it was the action of the National Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why does not the Government play the game with the cards upon the table? What is the use of making such an observation as that? It deceives nobody. I repeat what I said yesterday, that an Irish judge has quite enough to do to attend to his judicial duties, and I respectfully submit that he has no right on a Board of Education. He was not put there to see that education was properly conducted, or that the proper subjects were taught; he was put there as the sentinel of the British Government to prevent Irish history and the Irish language being taught in the schools, and then the English Government, when they have packed the jury, say they are not responsible. It is absurd to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman can put upon the shoulders of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland the responsibility which belongs to the British Government itself. Everybody knows that in Dublin Castle, if the smallest wish were expressed for anything which a Government Department wants, they would have it the next afternoon. How is Ireland managed? A few dinners at the Castle, a few Orders of St. Patrick, a few knighthoods, and a few advances in salary. There is not a man in Ireland honestly attached to the system. The landlords stand up for you because of their rents; if they were sure of their rents under a Nationalist Parliament they would join us in a moment, especially if they could see their way to 5 per cent. extra. All the official class are on the make. They are not satisfied with their salary, they want an advance, and when they get that they want a pension, and when that is provided they want promotion for somebody else. I wonder if there is any one in the world who despises the Irish more than a Chief Secretary for Ireland. I would like to see the diary of an Irish Secretary, stuffed with the letters he has received, and the applications for advances, baronetries, and promotions, and the miserable intrigues that are carried on in order to obtain these things, with the great majority of the Irish population standing sullenly aside and looking on with absolute contempt and derision of the whole system. Does the right hon. Gentleman say he could not have Irish taught? He could do it by telephone. Call up the Education Board: "Are you there, Education Department?" "Yes, your honour." "Have Irish taught in the morning." "Yes, your honour," and it is done. Why can it not be done? Because it would have to go through the whole list of the right hon. Gentlemen's appointees, and you would find that everybody wants something else. Independence of character in the official classes is entirely absent. There is no freedom of thought, except among the poor class. The rich are either running after invitations to dinner or the Order of St. Patrick. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that our views cannot be met. I want to know the reason why. You have got the Army, Navy, and Volunteers to uphold your system. You have the tax-gatherer coming round to collect the taxes, and we should still be paying £3,000,000 too much, and for what earthly reason our views cannot be met, except the bottom hatred that prevails against everything Irish in the minds of our rulers, I cannot see. But it is because you refuse to accord to us these small matters, which you say are mere matters of sentiment, but which are the just demands of our country, that the connection between the two countries is, and will always continue to be, one of hatred and mistrust.

*THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin Co., S.): I wish to say a few words in this debate, because the question on which we shall divide is one which might make a man appear to be voting against his convictions. I entirely associate myself with the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who appears to me to have approached this matter in the most sensible and practical manner. I went into these districts for the purpose of satisfying myself upon this question, and my mind is fully made up upon it. I can give the Committee one curious instance of the necessity of teaching in bilingual districts through the medium of the Irish language. Some of my friends were anxious to introduce the German system of agricultural credit, and in these districts we found it absolutely necessary to teach that system through the Irish language. We had to employ an Irish organiser and have our leaflets translated into Irish. That is a good practical illustration of the bilingual teaching which many of us are anxious to see. Coming to the question of what can be done and what is best to be done, what are the facts that prompt hon. Members opposite to say that a minority of the Commissioners of Education have overruled the majority in the matter of teaching the

Mr. T. M. Healy.

Irish language? I am informed that the matter has never come before the Commissioners at all except in the shape of resolutions in identical terms from a large number of public bodies. The only way that it seems to me that the matter can properly come before them is through the managers, and no manager, I am informed, has made any request to the Commissioners upon the subject; when they do it will be quite time to rate the Commissioners upon their inaction. The Commissioners, in the meantime, have adopted a new rule that within the limit of the curriculum the managers shall arrange the programme of their schools to suit the needs of the locality within which that school is situated. That is a very sensible endeavour to do away with that rigidity of programme and over-centralisation to which the hon. Gentleman who opened this debate made reference. The object of this rule is to introduce that elasticity into the programme which, I take it, we all desire. Many hon. Gentlemen coming from those districts will be able to say better than I, but the impression I gained in many of these districts was that the people themselves were not strongly in favour of Irish being taught. Those of us who have travelled in America are aware that a large number of emigrants have been prejudiced owing to their want of familiarity with the English language, and in some districts it is believed that the bilingual system may lead to less teaching of the English language. We do not agree with that, but that is in the mind of the people. Another difficulty is that the managers say they cannot get Irish teachers. It was suggested by an hon. Member opposite that that difficulty would be easily overcome by the training college. I do not myself think it would, because it seems to me that the English-speaking teacher who had merely acquired a smattering of Irish, which is all he could acquire in a year, would not be much use in conveying to the minds of children the English tongue through the medium of the Irish language. What we want to abolish is the system of people teaching through a language with which they themselves are not familiar. The teachers should be Irish speaking in order to do what we wish to see done effectively. An hon. Member had complained that Irish had ceased to be a remunerative subject; it always was an extra subject, and can only now be a remunerative subject by being an extra subject. I do not now wish to occupy the time of the House further, for many hon. Members I know have come over from Ireland especially to debate this question, and therefore I only say in conclusion that, although this debate has no doubt done good, I believe that this question can be very much more easily dealt with by public opinion in Ireland. I believe the Chief Secretary in the speech he has made will have largely influenced the managers if they are not already converted to that view.

*MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) said he was personally interested in this question, as in the county of Donegal, one of the divisions of which he represented, there were no fewer than 60,000 Irish-speaking people. It had frequently been said in the House that there was a larger percentage of illiterates in South Donegal than in any other constituency. If that was so it was absolutely due to the system of education which did not enable Irish-speaking children to be educated in the English language through the medium of the Irish language. He could not help thinking that the English Government had by that system perpetuated as far as they could the brutal proscription of language which remained on the Statute-book from former times. The habit of teaching children who could only speak Irish through the medium of English was so humorous that if it were not wicked it might well form part of the travesties of Mr. Gilbert. It was a curious thing that in this district, which through the operations of the English Government had been practically denied education, there were, when Ireland had a control of her own in educational matters, men who were famed throughout Europe for their scholarship. They founded monasteries on the Continent of Europe, and in England they founded Durham cathedral. The children of Donegal were now denied learning through the vile system of the English Government. The Chief Secretary had been told again and again of the evils which the system produced. By a stroke of his pen he could completely alter the system. All he had to do was to say that there should be Irishspeaking teachers, and that English should be taught through the medium of the Irish language. It was a subterfuge to say that it was the fault of the managers of the schools. It was nothing of the kind. Managers had a most limited selection, and the number from whom they must select were not necessarily Irish-speaking teachers. He remembered that recently in the Transvaal one of the great grievances was that the Uitlanders were not allowed to address the Volkraal in their own language; but in Ireland the English Government did not allow Irish-speaking children to be taught in their own language. Could they not do in Ireland exactly what they had done in Wales? What was the great difficulty or distinguishing feature which precluded them from giving to the Irish-speaking people a chance of succeeding in the race of life? He confessed there was nothing more melancholy than to see, as they might in some parts of Ireland, men and women who could neither read nor write—splendid specimens of manhood and womanhood. They contrasted with all their ignorance and illiteracy most favourably with the Stock Exchange “bulls” and “bears,” who could both read and write. On these grounds he hoped the hon. Gentleman would make a comprehensive change in the system. It could not but be said that so long as the system lasted and children were taught in school in a language different from their own vernacular, they were really proscribing the education of an entire race of people. They were denying them learning just as they endeavoured in former days to turn the Catholics to Protestantism. Although illiteracy had been truthfully charged against the peasants of Donegal, he felt that it was one of the meanest and vilest charges ever uttered, for the illiteracy had been forced on the people who had not only the greatest desire for learning, but also a natural capacity for it. What was asked was that all Irish-speaking children should be given teachers with whom they could communicate and should be taught in their own language. He had placed the question of the Irish language on a practical basis, but at the same time there were matters involved which were not of a merely material character. “Man doth not live by bread only.” While these people had been shut out of all the benefits and chances of promotion in life, there was inflicted on them a still more grievous calamity—they were shut out from the intellectual delights to be found in the fields of knowledge which proper education would confer. What was asked would not increase the expenditure of the Government. He would urge the right hon. Gentleman to use his influence with the Commissioners to give the people the benefits of education through the medium of the Irish language. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman dominated the Irish Commissioners and they would give the greatest consideration to any advice he would give. To deny to the people of the Irish-speaking districts teachers who understood the language was to carry out a barbarous penal system. They asked for an act of the very purest justice. His own constituency in Donegal had been proscribed from education long enough, and he hoped the English Government would now grant the request that was made.

MAJOR JAMESON (Clare, W.) said the right hon. Member for South Dublin had conveyed to the House an absolutely wrong impression in suggesting that if knowledge of the Irish language was not imparted it was the fault of the managers of the schools and not of the Government. Within the last three years the number of marks at examinations for Irish had been decreased, while the number of marks for Greek had been increased, and this notwithstanding hon. Gentlemen opposite twitted them by calling Irish a dead language. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin was right in saying that he had made a few friends on that side of the House. The reason was that he had won for himself the hatred of many of the officials of Dublin Castle, and the hatred of the community in Ireland who disliked everything that was Irish. That was the reason why they thought something more of him on that side of the House. He could quite understand the position of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chief Secretary. They looked forward to the day when the Chief Secretary should be an Irishman, but he thought there would be no necessity for the present Chief Secretary to learn Irish. They looked forward to the day when the officials would have alone the desires of the Irish people at heart. They did not ask hon. Members opposite to put their hands in their pockets for one sixpence; they merely asked to be allowed to carry out the wishes of the Irish people in regard to this matter. If the right hon. Gentleman refused this very small boon he would refuse what was the wish certainly of three-fourths of the Irish people.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Donegal, W.) felt bound, as knowing the intensity of the feeling amongst bishops, priests, and people in favour of the contention the Irish Members were putting forward, to give some brief expression to the views he knew to obtain among the people. The most rev. Bishop O'Donnell, Bishop of Raphoe, was an ecclesiastic of high attainments and high culture, and he was one of the most devoted friends and earnest advocates of the principle being contended for that evening. The priests were men who spoke the Irish language, but there were numerous schools in his district taught according to the system of the National Board, which, instead of expediting education, was an obstacle and an obstruction. The most rapid way in which one could get a language, and the ideals represented by the language, into the minds of boys and girls was to explain them to them in a language they understood. It was simply cruel to hold young people back from the degree of advancement they would gain in coming time if they were rightly treated. They were told the present system was due to a desire on the part of their beneficent British rulers to give the young people a chance of an early start in life, to make their way in the world when they left their native soil. If it was the well being and advancement of the Irish people that were desired by the English Government, that desire could have been shown in many ways, but it had not been done. The claim for a Catholic University might be taken as a test. If the Government wanted to cultivate the flower of Irish intellect, genius, and scholarship, they could have acceded to that fair and reasonable request of the Irish people of all creeds and classes. There were no doubt a few bigots who made a little noise, beat drums, and pretended to be much greater and more powerful than they really were. But they were a mere handful and a small minority. They had, however, succeeded in frightening the British Government, which professed not to be afraid of any race or people. The Government were afraid of the Orange drum, which had been beaten in Ulster, but why not in this matter have regard for Irish sentiment? Why not show some sense of gratitude? Although a long story it was a true story, and not a legend, that Irishmen educated and Christianised a great part of England. In their great schools the Irish gave free education and free food to the students who came across from England. In the great city of Armagh there existed one of the great Irish schools to which students came from England to learn knowledge and civilisation. What better could Ireland do for England than make Christians of Pagans, and make ignorant people intelligent? But what reward did they get? They had this national system, which was not carried out, devised, or designed according to the views, wishes, or feelings of the Irish people. It was a foreign institution; a foreign spirit ruled it from first to last; and it was high time the Irish people rose in revolt against it. There was now a revolt in Ireland against this cruel system, and it need not be imagined that it was a little sentimental outburst, coming up like a flower, which would wither away again very shortly. It was the commencement of a great national movement, and the movement was growing, increasing, and strengthening every day. Young men and women were joining Gaelic classes who had never heard Irish spoken before, and they were learning the Gaelic tongue with enthusiasm. He knew young people who had never heard Gaelic spoken in their own homes, but who were now teaching Gaelic classes in Ireland. That showed how the movement was growing, and he claimed for it the fair play and sympathy of a cultured and enlightened people. Everybody knew how it broadened a man's intellectual power to learn another language; if he knew but one tongue he was cabined, cribbed and confined in his search after knowledge. There were many arguments which might be advanced in favour of this moderate demand of the Irish nation. He had no doubt the English rulers had hoped to kill out the Irish language; they thought it was doomed to death; but it was fated not to die. England was always robbing Ireland of one thing or another, but this was something the English did not want for themselves, and yet would not allow the Irish to have. Irish lands were confiscated, Irish manufactures destroyed. Ireland was robbed of her Parliament, and the English did their best to rob her of her religion, but in that they were defeated. She was plundered by over-taxation, but after all these grabbings and takings she asked only for fair play for her young people in keeping alive and cultivating their mother tongue. He pleaded that no obstacles should be thrown in the way, but that the movement should be helped and encouraged. England would be no poorer or worse for it, but Ireland would be much happier. At present the language was one of the relics of the past; Ireland's ancient history was bound up with it, and she would not part with it. He was thankful and proud to have lived to see the day when there was a great movement in that direction, and a revival of Irish feeling in that respect, and he was confident that the movement would thrive, prosper, and succeed. Some speakers had treated the subject as though it was desired to banish the English language from Ireland. No such proposition or suggestion had been made. It was a gross misrepresentation to pretend to the English people that that was the object of the movement. It was essential that the Irish people should be able to speak the language spoken on the great continent of America among that friendly, free, and sympathetic people. It was also necessary that they should know the English tongue when they went to the great new Commonwealth which had just been constituted and formed by the people of Australia. It was, therefore, absurd to make the suggestion to which he had referred. No harm would be done to any English interest; England would lose nothing by it. Whatever concession the Government might make, the Irish people were determined to keep this subject going until their object was attained. It was not necessary for him to argue the matter further, but he felt bound to let his voice be heard on the subject, as otherwise he would feel he had not done his duty. The speech of the Chief Secretary had been sympathetic, and if he would pluck up heart and go a little further, he would win for himself a grateful and kindly feeling on the part of the Irish people. The nation meant to alter the condition of things under which numbers of Irish people never heard a word of Irish in their lives, and every word of sympathy and help in that struggle would be repaid with affectionate and friendly feeling by the people of Ireland.

Mr. DALY (Monaghan, S.) said the directions he had received during the last few days were to the effect that the people of his constituency were anxious that the Government should introduce the teaching of the Irish language into the schools. To his own knowledge, in the district where he came from, in which English only was spoken, he could assure the Committee that there were a great number of classes where Irish was being taught. He was rather disappointed with the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, for he had always been under the impression that the right hon. Gentleman was accountable for the entire government of Ireland. If any hon. Member put a question in the House about education they would put it to the Chief Secretary. The Chief Secretary had stated that he had no power over the Education Board, and yet he answered for them in this House. Such an argument was entirely inconsistent with the office which the Chief Secretary held. Therefore he was greatly surprised at the statement which had been made, for the right hon. Gentleman had tried to place the entire blame upon the shoulders of the managers of the schools. If a manager of a school in Ireland wanted a teacher who could teach Irish, where was he to get that teacher? There were no training colleges to teach them, and if a teacher were appointed who understood Irish probably an inspector would be sent from this country to award marks for the teaching of a subject about which he knew absolutely nothing. It was a very remarkable fact that, in the west of Ireland, where the Irish language was so largely spoken, out of 1,300 schools no less than 1,164 of them were anxious that Irish should be taught in those schools. Could there be anything more conclusive than that fact?

Mr. T. D. Sullivan.

The right hon. Gentleman had been met by arguments from the Irish Members which could not be controverted. The speech of Dr. Starkie, the new Resident Commissioner, had been placed before the Committee. The Chief Secretary had just made a speech, and he scarcely knew whether the right hon. Gentleman was for or against their demands. He stated that he had no power with the Commissioners of National Education, and yet he had to answer for them in the House of Commons. All the same, he believed that if the right hon. Gentleman stated to the Commissioners for National Education that it was his wish that they should introduce the teaching of the Irish language in Irish-speaking districts, that statement would take away a great deal of the soreness of the Irish people upon this question. It was very remarkable that while the Irish people could not get permission to have their own language taught in their own schools, the Welsh people obtained that concession long ago. There were only about 2,000 Jews in Ireland, and yet their language was fostered and allowed to be taught. The Jews were allowed this privilege, and yet the Irish were not. This was another Irish grievance which had been put forward so often in this House with the same inevitable result. The Chief Secretary said that there was no desire on behalf of the Irish people to have their children taught the home language, but he was quite wrong. There was a convent where he came from where the children were sent to be educated, and one of the subjects taught there was Irish. He knew that thirty-five young ladies from that convent competed at the intermediate examinations last year. Those children came from the most respectable class of people in Ireland, and if the parents of those children were not anxious that their children should learn their native language, was it likely that they would send them to schools where Irish was taught? This was a very strong argument, showing that Irish parents of the most respectable class were anxious that their children should understand and be able to converse in the tongue which the British Government had done so much to remove and stamp out in Ireland. The Commissioners of Education had put in kindergarten, singing, and other matters to be taught, but the Irish language was not there. Although the right hon. Gentleman had stated he had no power over the Commissioners, he believed that if the Chief Secretary only gave that body a hint they would not be very long before they acted upon it, and he was sure that by so doing he would earn the gratitude of the Irish people. It was not the slightest use delaying this matter, because the Irish language would have to be taught in the Irish schools. The people of Ireland were determined to know their native tongue, and the right hon. Gentleman might as well at once give the Commissioners instruction to do something which would eventually have to be done.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): Whilst listening to the sympathetic speech made by the right hon. Gentleman, for some time I could not tell whether he was for or against us, but when he denied responsibility for the policy of the Education Board in Ireland that satisfied me that he was not to be trusted in the matter. When the Chief Secretary denies responsibility for men whom he has himself appointed I decline to accept his denial of responsibility. What has the right hon. Gentleman done to remove this disability? I certainly have seen no action at all on his part in this direction beyond a few words of sympathy, which, as far as we are concerned, means nothing at all. We intend to test the genuineness of the sympathy of the Chief Secretary upon this question. We want him to carry out the same system which has already been granted to Wales. I feel it my duty to state that I believe there is a conspiracy existing between him and the Education Board against our native language. If the right hon. Gentleman means to put himself right with the Irish people let him tell us plainly that he means to carry out in Ireland the bilingual system which is already in operation in Wales.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): There are a couple of points which, to my mind, have not yet been advanced in this debate. This is the only opportunity afforded us in this House on the Estimates of criticising the action of the National Board of Education. It has always been a puzzle to me why certain gentlemen are called the National Board, because I have always regarded them as an anti-Irish Board, and I think even the dual occupants of the Treasury Bench this evening can hardly contradict that statement. It is because they are anti-Irish that they have this extraordinary objection to the teaching of the Irish language. Any literary man who has studied this subject must know perfectly well that a language is distinctly a part of the nation, and a great scholar once said that the nation which loses its language loses the best part of its existence. If that is true of other nations I can hardly understand why it should not be applied also to Ireland. To my mind, that is precisely the reason why the National Board of Education do not desire to teach the Irish language in Ireland. I have had some experience in this matter, although I do not pretend to be a profound Irish scholar. I have spent some time in Connemara, and I know that the children who used to attend the schools there were only taught English, and the Irish language was discouraged as far as possible. Not only this, but it was made absolutely penal to speak the Irish language. That was an absolute fact. I was told it by hundreds of people in Connemara, and in that district there was actually a penal law against speaking the language of the people. I challenge any hon. Member to contest my statement and to inquire whether such a thing ever took place in Connemara. I regret to find that these old bad traditions are apparently still a working factor in the minds of the National Board of Education. I would appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether we have not arrived at a different stage of civilisation, when we ought to be more in accord with the spirit of the times, and when we ought not to revert to the old bad system of coercion. What is the raison d'être of constitutional government? It is that it should be administered in the spirit of the community it governs. We have now a manifestation all over the country in the shape of a Gaelic revival, and it is one of the most vaunted of constitutional maxims that public opinion ought to be the breath of the law. But in this matter the spirit of the law is absolutely opposed to popular opinion. Why do I say that? Only last night an enormous meeting was held in the Round Room or Rotunda—the largest hall in Dublin. It was a public protest on this very question. I received an invitation to attend, but was obliged to decline it because I had to come to the House of Commons. Cardinal Logue wrote a letter which was read at that meeting, and letters were read from other public men, and a resolution was passed calling on the Irish Members of Parliament to resist the proposals of the Commissioners until they had been amended by making provision for bilingual education in Ireland as in Wales. There is a manifestation of public opinion in Ireland, and here to-night we have the Chief Secretary telling us that he has no control whatever over the so-called National Board of Education, and that even the House of Commons has no power, although the taxpayers of Ireland provide the funds whereby education is carried out. That would not be allowed to exist in any other constitutionally governed country in the world. If the Chief Secretary wants philosophic, educational, or literary reasons why the bilingual system should be adopted in Ireland, he will find them in a short practical pamphlet issued by the Gaelic League. I have been requested by the branch of the League to which I belong to speak in this debate. The other evening we had a meeting in the town hall of Blackrock. I was in the chair, and the enthusiasm evinced at the meeting was something extraordinary. The right hon. Gentleman may tell us that there is no spirit among the people as regards this movement, but in Blackrock the urban district council—formerly a Conservative body, but which has lately assumed a Nationalist complexion—has put the names of the streets in Gaelic, so that we are Irish still, notwithstanding the efforts of the National Board; and it seems to me that if the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench would approach this question in a philosophic spirit, they would recognise that fact. I want to argue this question not from an extreme Nationalist point of view, but from an educational, practical, common-sense point of view. I would put this to the right hon. Gentleman: is it a wise thing to provoke friction between the people and the National Education Board, when there ought to be co-operation in the fullest sense of the word? That is not a proposition that will be contradicted even by those who hold the opposite view on this question. Our people are very much in earnest, and unless the demand of the Irish Members is assented to the attendance in the schools may possibly be reduced, which would be an unmixed evil. I have always been in favour of carrying out the clause for compulsory attendance at schools, because, unless the children attend school regularly, there cannot be any educational progress in the country. Some hon. Members opposite—possibly the Chief Secretary, and undoubtedly the majority of the National Board—think this is a sentimental question. Granted that it is. But you want the children to attend school, and anything that would bring about friction and lessen the school attendance would be nothing less than a national evil. In conclusion, I will only say that the National Board—which is a nominated Board, which does not represent the people, and which is out of touch with popular opinion—is the worst body you could have to carry out what is called national education, and if the Chief Secretary declares in this House that he is unable to control the Board, then I think it is time it was brought under the control of somebody. Mr. Butt once declared that the worst system of government was government by irresponsible nominated Boards, and I think this Board of Education ought to be elected, or at any rate responsible to the elected representatives of the people. There can be no question of such importance to the community at large as the question of education, and yet in Ireland we put the whole management of the education of the country into the hands of seven gentlemen who are responsible to nobody, and over whom the taxpayers have no control whatever, and who have chosen by their unwise action to introduce friction between the people of Ireland and the system of education in that country. I hope the arguments I have advanced will be considered by the right hon. Gentleman. I have endeavoured to put them forward in a reasonable way, and without introducing any extreme political tinge, because I think this is a matter we ought to approach in a calm spirit of consideration, for there is nothing more important to a community than its system of education.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.):

I am not satisfied with merely giving a silent vote on this motion. Speaking as the representative of an Irish constituency and also as an Irish Protestant, I wish to express my entire agreement with most of the arguments I have heard from below the gangway. It seems to me that neither of the right hon. Gentlemen who spoke from the Treasury bench treated the question in a very ingenuous manner, for while both of them expressed strong sympathy with the general object of the motion, they each endeavoured as it were to divert the mind of the Committee from what the real issue is. The Chief Secretary endeavoured to convert this question as to the teaching of Irish in National schools in Ireland into a question of far greater and wider application. I do not understand that the object of this motion is to substitute Irish for English as the spoken language of the Irish people. That is a much larger question which can be dealt with if ever it arises. The question we have to consider to-night is the Vote for the National Education Board. The right hon. Gentleman while expressing sympathy with the object of the motion tried to shirk all responsibility and to throw it on the National Board. I am not going to say one word with reference to the component members of the Board. For many of them individually I have the highest respect, but the fact that Protestants and Catholics are equally balanced on it indicates to me that it is a Board not for the purpose of considering what is best in order to promote the education of the country, but what is best to enable the balance to be maintained without any great outrage to either side. It is quite a fallacy to say that the Government or this House has no control over the National Board. But the House of Commons has to vote the money for the Board, and on this motion the House of Commons have to take the responsibility of deciding on which side the merits of the question rest. Therefore it is vain for the right hon. Gentleman to say in one breath that he is quite in accord with Irish Members below the gangway, and then in another breath that he is utterly powerless to further his own view. I also think that the Vice-President of the Board of Agriculture was not very ingenuous, because he seemed to convey to the Committee that the Board of Education in their new rules had initiated something which was in the direction aimed at by this motion. In that he was quite under a mistake, because the insignificant note to which he referred is merely the repetition of a note which has appeared in the rules of the National Board since 1883. What then becomes of the entire argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Board of Agriculture? He endeavoured to smooth down the hon. Members below the Gangway—which is not very easy to do—by stating that the National Board had initiated a new rule which would probably lead to what was desired by hon. Members, but he must not have been aware that that was a mere repetition of a note which for seventeen years has appeared in the Code, and which has led not to the promotion but to the gradual extinction of the teaching of the Irish language in the National schools. What is the real issue? It is not the absurd idea that at the end of the nineteenth century the 4,500,000 inhabitants of Ireland should at once begin to learn Irish, and that all our business and all our litigation should in future be carried on in Irish. That is not the intention of any rational man. The object and intention is to teach the rising generation Irish, and through Irish to teach them English, and to educate their minds in order to fit them for the struggle of life. That is the question at issue, and also whether it is to be done in the manner which is commended by the hierarchy of Ireland and by 1,200 managers of schools and which was voiced at the meeting at the Rotunda last evening. What could be more reasonable? The demand is that in all places where Irish is the home language pupils should be taught to read and write it, and that other useful subjects should be imparted to them through the medium of Irish. It appears that the number of Irish-speaking people in Ireland is at present 630,000, who reside principally in the West, within a line drawn from Donegal—whose claims have been so eloquently expressed by one of its representatives to-night—down to Waterford, and the question is whether in these districts every facility should not be given to the young people to be taught through the medium of Irish. I recollect once when travelling in Kerry I stopped at the village of Sneem. I went into the National school, and on one side were drawn up about forty little boys, their bright black eyes and dark hair rendering their nationality unmistakable. On the opposite side was an equal number of boys not quite so dark. I asked the teacher what it meant. "Oh," he said, "these boys to the left can only speak Irish, and those to the right can speak English, and my plan is to teach the Irish-speaking boys through Irish, and also to endeavour to teach the English-speaking boys some knowledge of the Irish language." That is the style of thing I would like to see prevailing in all National schools in Irish-speaking districts. What a lamentable thing it would be if the Irish language, for want of encouragement, was really to become a dead language! The language of every country is an historic asset, and how sad and lamentable it would be if, through the neglect of the Government of the country, a language which by common consent and tradition embodies in itself poetry and matters of historical interest, were to be wholly lost. If that language were to become a dead language where it is now the language of nearly a million of people, what responsibility would rest not merely on the Government, but on the representatives of that people! I think we are bound to use every exertion to keep alive that language. What would we not give to have languages which are dead revived again! What would we not give if the great Latin language were a spoken and written language again! What would we not give if the language of the magnificent sublimity of Socrates and Homer were alive again! Anyone who does not try to arrest the decay of a language is in my opinion guilty of a great historical crime. We seek, therefore, that the National Board should be compelled to make this change, and that English should be taught in Irish-speaking districts through the medium of Irish. Is not that the obvious way to teach the youth in these districts? If you want to teach an Irish boy English you at teach him through a language understands and in which he thinks. otherwise he will only learn English like arrot, by rote. In old libraries are to found Latin grammars in which not y the grammatical part but also the planatory part is in Latin. That idea exploded now, because it was found to such an enormously difficult way of ching the language. Now, in all tin and Greek grammars the explana- y part is in English, and the gram- tical part in the language which it is ight to teach. For the Irish-speaking tricts the grammatical part of an Eng- 1 grammar should be in English and ; explanatory part should be in Irish. is vain and absurd to try to relieve the tional Board from responsibility on the und that they cannot get teachers to ch Irish. I deny that altogether. We ow that in everything—educational well as commercial—the demand ays creates the supply. Do not tell you cannot get plenty of Irish chers. In fact, in my boyhood days re were several what were called edge-schoolmasters” in Tipperary. I ember myself learning the Lord’s ayer in Irish, which was, I suppose, at made me such a good Christian. hen I heard the eloquent speech of the 1. Member for the Flint Boroughs, to om we all are indebted, I had in my ollection an old teacher who endea- ired, when I was very small indeed, to til into me a knowledge of the Irish guage, and if I had had the oppor- tunity afterwards I am not at all sure at I would nor have been able to orate ch better in that language than I can er hope to do in English. Then the er part of the demand is equally sonable—namely, that a knowledge of Irish language should be made a ecessary subject of examination, and put least on a level with the dead guages. I am a great admirer of the d languages. I studied them very ch, and I would not give up my know- ge of them for any earthly acquisition. ny people find great difficulty in rning Latin or Greek, but give a young shman an opportunity of learning the guage of his own country, of reading legends of his own country, full of oism, and full of that spirit which still athes in the pages of immortal Homer, l you will not only elevate his character, but make him a better citizen than he is at present.

MR. DILLON : This has been an extremely interesting debate, and for more reasons than one. For myself it has been exceedingly interesting because it affirms a prophecy I made two or three years ago in this House, when we listened to a less sympathetic speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary—a prophecy that this was a genuine national movement, and would spread. It has spread and increased in strength so largely that he will find it a more popular movement than he even now seems to think. I desire to say in regard to the speech delivered to-night by the right hon. Gentleman, that, although he undoubtedly exhibited considerable sympathy with the cause we advocate, he minimised and underrated the importance of the question. He commenced by finding fault with the hon. Member for Waterford because the hon. Gentleman spoke of this question as involving the whole future of the Irish race in its higher and spiritual sense. Now, I think that language is justified, and that the considerations involved do seriously affect the whole future of the Irish race. Although the right hon. Gentleman has shown a considerable advance on the subject to-night—and I recognise the sympathetic tone of his speech—I think he has still failed to understand and appreciate the full bearing of this question, and the value placed upon it by those who are advocating it in Ireland. This is a question which is not at all exhausted when we deal with the considerations as to teaching the children in Irish-speaking districts the use of their own tongue, and instructing them in the English language and various subjects of education through the medium of their own tongue. That is a pressing and urgent question ; but it is small compared with the great subject of the value of the language itself, and all that is contained in it, to the spiritual condition of the Irish people. Before dealing with the more practical part of the question, I desire to say that I hold diametrically opposite views from those expressed by the hon. Member for East Down. He thinks that in encouraging the Irish language we are engaged in a foolish and mischievous task, and he gave us the reasons for that opinion. First of all, he laid down the doctrine that the value of a language was to be estimated by the number of people who spoke it, and that without any qualification whatever. And he went on to say that if a language was spoken by few people it was practically valueless. I would point out that by that canon of criticism Chinese is by far the most valuable language spoken by the human race. See where that proposition carries us! If the value of a language is to be estimated by the number of people who speak it, then the Greek language is the most valueless, because the number of people who spoke the language of Homer never exceeded two or three millions. According to the hon. Gentleman's argument the Greek language was contemptible, and ought to have been wiped out in favour of the Persian language. To come to the Latin language, which spread all over Europe and some parts of Asia, the same argument could have been used with even greater force in the days of the supremacy of the Empire of Rome in favour of the obliteration of the language of Greece, because the latter was only spoken by a despised, an insignificant, and a conquered nation. And yet that language and literature have carried down the stream of time the most precious portions of our civilisation. They remain, and will not be dislodged even by the hon. Member for East Down. We are more indebted to the spiritual power of the language and literature of that little conquered people of Greece than to the great Empire of Rome itself. I need not point to the history of the Hebrew race. According to the argument of the hon. Member for East Down, the Bible and the language of the Hebrews, who were a conquered race, would come under the same law as the language and literature of the Greeks. The fact is that the whole course of history shows us that the greatest spiritual lessons of mankind and the greatest literatures have sprung from small peoples and from languages spoken by a comparatively insignificant portion of the human race; and that there is no comparison between the value of a language and the number of people who speak it. Therefore there is no force in that argument. The hon. Gentleman, and I must say to some extent others who have spoken from the Government Benches, seem to think that they have settled this question when they look upon it from a purely utilitarian point of view. But I utterly repudiate that criterion of judgment. I say that while it is perfectly legitimate to argue this question from a utilitarian point of view, you cannot exhaust it and arrive at a proper judgment from that single standpoint. The hon. Gentleman opposite talks about trade, and says that no language is of value except English, then Chinese, and next German or French. [An HON. MEMBER: No.] I understood him to say that Chinese was one of the most important languages if we are to be guided by the amount of trade. But that is a principle which we cannot and do not accept. We base our demand for the preservation of, and fair play being given to, the ancient language of our people on higher considerations than mere utilitarianism. We hold that we have a right to reinstate the Irish language and literature in the place of honour from which they were driven in the days of conquest and persecution; because we believe that if you interrupt the intellectual life of the people, if you tear them out by the roots, as it were, and plant them down in the midst of an alien civilisation, and of a race with whose traditions and history they are unacquainted and entirely out of sympathy, you will effectually dwarf their intellectual growth and injure the moral fibre of the entire race. Viewed from that point, the subject is one of infinitely greater importance and deeper and more philosophic weight than the right hon. Gentleman seems to recognise. What is the history of the Irish language? Down to the time of the famine the Irish language was the habitual speech of the south and west of Ireland, and, although I do not believe in any of the figures on the subject taken at that time, at least three millions of the people of Ireland used the Irish tongue as the habitual means of social and commercial communication. All the small gentry in the part of the country I come from spoke no other language. At that time there was a great movement in Ireland to revive the literature and songs and music of Ireland, and there were in Dublin scholars who from their various acquirements could bear comparison with those of any other country in Europe—Currie, O'Sullivan,

Mr. Dillon.

O'Kelly, and others, who have hardly left a successor. These men, had they lived in a normal condition of things, would have been founders of schools, and I venture to say that had it not been for the famine and the vile persecution to which the language and literature of Ireland were subjected, these Irish scholars would have now held as high a position in the learning of Europe as any of the great scholars who now stand in the forefront of philological learning and folk-lore. But what happened? The National movement was more or less identified with the study of the language, folk-lore and music of Ireland; and the whole of the men then engaged in Irish studies were isolated, divorced from support, and viewed with evil suspicion by the Irish Government. The great seats of learning in Ireland discouraged Irish scholarship and started a crusade of the most atrocious character against the Irish leaders. That is a part, and a most vital part of this question, and I could undertake to show that all the great seats of learning in Ireland, including Trinity College, boycotted Irish learning and Irish scholars, so that to become an Irish scholar was synonymous with starvation. And so the last great race of Irish scholars died in a state of the most miserable poverty—a scandal and a disgrace to the Government of the day and to the seats of learning. What was the consequence? In the days when we were young we could not learn Irish; there was no opportunity for doing so; and those who took any interest in the subject were condemned to the cruel humiliation of seeing the whole traditions of Irish scholarship pass away to Germany and France. To-day's Times newspaper is filled with admiration at a German coming over to Ireland and publishing a great work on the Irish language, and it goes on to say that "more had been done for Celtic studies by a few German scholars from the time of Zeuss down to the present day than by all the vain chattering of Irish literary societies." That only exhibits the gross and savage ignorance of the Times in regard to the Irish language and literature; and I venture to say that if Zeuss had been living to-day he would have been the first to condemn that insult to Irish scholarship. Zeuss did, no doubt, a great deal, but nothing compared with O'Kelly,

O'Sullivan, and others, who, had they lived in Germany or France, would have been honoured, and their lives made comfortable; but because they lived in Ireland, and were Irishmen, were starved and made scarecrows of, to prevent other Irishmen following in their steps. When the right hon. Gentleman, I am sure without the intention of inflicting pain upon us, pointed to the fact that Irish was an unpopular subject of study in the higher colleges and universities of Ireland, he forgot why that was. It was because to be an Irish student, an Irish scholar, was enough to shut to a man every avenue of success in Ireland, and because, owing—to its shame be it said—to the bigotry of Trinity College, which has in its library some of the finest monuments of Irish literature and art in the world, and of the other great learned bodies in Ireland, and to the persecution of the Government, Irish scholars of a past generation, giants as they were, were condemned to poverty and misery, and had to trust for their living to a few private patrons. That is the reason why Irish is not a popular study in the great seats of learning in Ireland. That is the A B C of this question, without which all that is involved in it cannot be understood. The language and literature of Ireland—which, by the admission of the greatest European scholars, is the richest, most valuable, and most varied of all Celtic languages and literatures—has been, down to our time, subjected to a persecution unparalleled in the history of our race. They have been banished from our universities, banned in our intermediate colleges and schools, and proscribed in the primary schools. That policy was the idea of the Government of the day. It was alleged that the study of the antiquities and history of Ireland was calculated to foster the national spirit, and they banned them both. That is the full explanation of why there should exist a certain lack of popularity, as has been the phrase, for Irish studies in the higher seats of learning. But in these modern times a new movement has sprung up. Like many other movements, it has sprung up from the people themselves. When the language was banned by all the great and wealthy societies like Trinity College, and outlawed by the Government, these associations sprang up among the people themselves, and commenced, in a small way for many years, to try and bring the language and literature of Ireland to the front. When I was a student I was one of the very first to form the old Society for the Preservation of the Irish Language. We did not make much progress to start with, and received absolutely no encouragement from the Government or the seats of learning. But the movement has grown and has been taken up afresh by the Gaelic League, who have aroused the strength of the Irish people in favour of their own tongue and literature. I congratulate that league on the success of their work, because it is due to them that this debate has been so prolonged, and that it has been supported by the vast majority of the Irish Members. When the right hon. Gentleman came to the practical bearing of this question he said he was in sympathy with the Gaelic League as regards their first claim—that in Irish-speaking districts Irish should be used in teaching English; but he said he had no power. I was acquainted with that. I knew that the National Board of Education was perfectly independent, except that the Lord Lieutenant may refuse to sanction new rules. That is the extraordinary thing. I do not know if in the whole civilised globe you can point to a body of men who have control over the education of the country, and for whom a Vote of £12,000 a year is passed, but over whom Parliament has absolutely no power. The Minister of Education in this country has control over the sums voted by Parliament, and is responsible to the people; but it is not so in Ireland. What are we to do? The most irrational thing would seem to be to endeavour to cut off a small portion of the provision for public education in Ireland, and I point out the absurdity of that. The Government deal in all kinds of absurd devices to dodge round the difficulties of the situation; but if the Government were to get the Irish Members together in Grand Committee we could settle all these matters from year to year. The reason why these matters are so perniciously arranged is that the views are consulted of High Churchmen in England, Nonconformists, and other people who do not know the facts of Ireland. That is what has destroyed Irish education, and has rendered it impossible for us to get the education of Ireland on a sound basis. To show the extreme vitality of the old language, a Danish professor, who went down to the west of Ireland a year ago, and lived among the people to study the old language, records this most remarkable fact. He went down and lived among the peasantry of Arran, and he says after living there for a short time he was able to write down 4,000 words "which I have heard them use in their every-day life." I venture to say that if any gentleman interested in linguistic studies goes down to Somerset or Kent he will not find 500 words used by the people in daily conversation. Yet in Ireland this gentleman asserts he put down 4,000 words. What do you substitute when you go teaching the English and banning the Irish language? You give them a vocabulary of 200 or 300 English words, with the meaning of which they are not acquainted, and is it any wonder that you make them stupid? You first reduce the vocabulary enormously, and the vocabulary you give them is not understood by the people who speak it. I only allude to that to show how enormously important the question is with regard to the intellectual equipment of these Irish-speaking peasants. The truth is that there has been a deliberate attempt to destroy the Irish language. The result is to keep these children in a state of ignorance and stupor, and we have to sit here night after night and year after year and listen to the taunts which are levelled at the illiteracy of our people, who have been kept illiterate by the State policy, and largely by this infamous campaign against their native tongue. This system has again and again been condemned by Government officials, but still the studied, dogged policy of the Board has been to ban the Irish language, and that has been carried on by successive Boards, supported by successive Chief Secretaries. It seems to be desirable to right it, but how is it to be carried further? We do not know. The Chief Secretary has no power and the Board refuses to move. I have no hesitation in characterising that as adding insult to injury. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that it is desirable to point out his own powers in the matter. I notice that he always seems to enlarge upon the difficulties. First of all, he made out that there was a difficulty in getting teachers. I am not surprised that there is after what I have described. Knowledge of Irish has been made the badge of inferiority and the object of oppression. How could there be a supply of teachers? There is no room for the study of the Irish language in the training colleges. It has not been encouraged in any way. It has always been given the cold shoulder, and how can you expect to get teachers when in the training colleges the subject is banned? It is nothing short of an outrage that at the training colleges of the State the Irish tongue should be completely ignored. The Gaelic League have displayed admirable activity in pushing this question as they have done. I am informed that there are 250 teachers who are conversant with the Irish tongue, but they get no engagements. But why are steps not taken to teach the Irish language in the training colleges? If it was made a subject ranking with the teachers among other subjects, would not the demand of a certainty create the supply in a short time? Does the right hon. Gentleman forget the memorial of the managers, representing well over 1,000 schools? As I understand the programme at present, there is no room for teaching Irish. What is the use of managers making provision for teachers of the Irish language if the Irish colleges have thrown it out? There is really no footing in the Irish schools for the Irish language, and I do not see how there could be a supply of teachers if the subject is not put upon a level with other subjects. We know perfectly well that in the Education Code the subjects that are to be taught are carefully set forth, and that Irish is put into the background, and that until quite recently, when some slight change was made, there was no encouragement. Therefore it is not fair to cast upon the managers the blame for a state of things which is the outcome of a long, continuous, and deliberate conspiracy to put the Irish language down. But there will be no fault hereafter if the teachers are forthcoming. I now turn for a moment to the question of the second demand of the Gaelic League. I think there is a good deal of vagueness in the nature of this second demand. The right hon. Gentleman said he took the second demand to imply that Irish should be made compulsory in all schools whether parents liked it or not. I do not think the matter is placed so high as that, nor have I ever gone so far. I think it would be an absurd thing; but, of course, in all movements like this there are enthusiasts. I know that there are persons in Ireland, with whom I differ, who suggest that we should take to the Irish and abandon the English tongue altogether. I do not go that length, nor do I believe that any great body of the people would agree to enforce Irish upon unwilling people. I would never be a party to it, and it has never been put forward. Neither of these reforms would be forced upon the schools; they would be introduced at the discretion of the managers. It is not to be supposed that a manager would force upon an unwilling school a subject that was distasteful to the people. As I understand it, it is a claim to restore the native language to a place of honour in all schools in Ireland, and I tell the right hon. Gentleman and the Board of Education, that, unless I am greatly mistaken, there never will be peace in Ireland until that is done. I conclude with the statement that my deep conviction is that until Irish language and Irish literature are raised to a position of equality with other subjects, in all the primary and secondary schools of Ireland, this agitation will never cease. We do not want to enforce it on any unwilling body of men, but we do insist, and we shall continue to until we succeed, upon the fact that the language and literature of our country shall occupy a position of honour in the primary and secondary schools and university colleges in Ireland. We want a university where Irish shall occupy a place of honour. We ask that the scarcity of teachers shall be met by the study of Irish literature and the Irish tongue, which shall lead on to chairs and fellowships, so that the students may have an opportunity of living; because students cannot live on suction, and if you tell a young man in Ireland that if he devotes himself to the study of Irish he must starve, you pursue a policy of proscription and persecution, which is a policy which we will never sit quietly under. We do not wish to attempt the impossible task of banishing the English tongue from Ireland, and depriving ourselves of the advantage of speaking that tongue, but we do insist upon the right of those who teach the Irish tongue being placed upon an equality with the teachers of other subjects, and we insist and demand that Irish scholarship in the future shall not be treated as it has been in the past as a badge of inferiority and contempt; but, on the contrary, that the Irish language and literature of the country shall be so treated that men may devote their lives and labours to that study, without having their footsteps dogged as the footsteps of Sheridan and O'Connell were dogged by the spectre of starvation.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) expressed satisfaction at the fact that the hon. Member for East Mayo disclaimed the extravagances which no doubt would cast some little ridicule upon this movement, and had not added to its strength. Irishmen could not be asked to give up speaking the English language and separate themselves from the great civilisation of the world which it represented. That was the most grotesque proposal that could be contemplated, and it had brought many persons to doubt the sincerity and reality of the movement in favour of the Irish language. Neither did he look forward to the production among present-day literature of a work in the Irish language; but for all that he maintained that there was reality and reason behind this movement. There were instances in the present century of a language almost dead having been revived, notably in the case of the Zeech language in Bohemia. So that the proposal to revive the Irish language was not without precedent. He was old enough to have seen a very great change in Ireland. He remembered in his childhood when the Irish tongue was a great deal more spoken than it was to-day. In this connection he had a very curious experience in California. While in California he was the guest in, Los Angeles, of a gentleman born not far from Athlone. This gentleman described how when a boy he saw a youth wandering through the market place in Athlone, but no one who met the boy understood a word he said, and whether he dropped from Heaven or came from some other region was a matter of doubt. This gentleman went up to him and found that the strange tongue was the Irish language. That would show how the native language had died away in Ireland. While in

Mr. Dillon.

Boston he was presented with an address, he thought in poetry, but he candidly confessed that he did not understand a word of it, because it was in the Irish tongue. The curious thing, however, was that some of the gentlemen who read the address to him and who composed it were men of Irish descent who had never been in Ireland. He also heard a lecture on the Irish language at the Royal Irish Academy by a German philologist—a most interesting lecture—and in recent years some of the highest authorities on the Irish tongue had been men of German birth. He was familiar with the bread-and-butter argument, which he did not entirely disclaim, but he recalled the labours of Professor Max Müller and the statement that the whole science of philology had been revolutionised by the discovery of Sanscrit, which was of still less bread-and-butter value than Irish. He wondered if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had read the essay of the Professor on the science of language. He understood that Sanscrit remained the ancient classical language of India, the value of which was not only as a key to the Indian languages of to-day, but also as the great link which bound together the Aryan languages of Europe and the Semitic languages of the East. Sanscrit played an important part in the study of philology, which was one of the greatest and finest of the new sciences of the age, and in the same way the right of the Irish language to survive and to be encouraged might be based alone on philological grounds. His hon. friend the Member for the Flint Boroughs had spoken of how his knowledge of Welsh enabled him to reach the inner hearts and minds of the Breton people. He might shew how the Irish language could act as a sort of rough interpreter between people of different nationalities. He met a gentleman in Los Angeles who left Ireland when quite a boy. He heard a fragment of conversation that passed between that gentleman and a shepherd who was tending sheep outside of Los Angeles. The shepherd spoke Basque, and that was another of the great Celtic family of languages. His friend was able to carry on a certain amount of conversation with that Basque shepherd from the north of Spain. The renaissance in connection with these languages was headed by some of the keenest and greatest intellects of the present day. There was one famous person, a Breton writer, who, although one of the greatest living masters of French prose, did everything in his power to encourage the Celtic revival among the Breton people. His hon. friend had not in the least exaggerated the depreciation and discouragement with which certain studies were visited between 1860 and 1870 in Ireland in Queen's College, Galway. The whole spirit of that unhappy period in Irish history was against the study of Irish. He was not without hope that this debate would bear good fruit, and he would like to impress on the Chief Secretary the fact that it was not enough for him to take up a position of neutrality on this question. The Irish language had been so discouraged and looked down upon that something like a serious effort was required to bring it back to its just and proper place in the education of Ireland. Coming to the second, and, to some extent, the more important branch of the question—the part which the study of Irish took in the education of Irish children in English as well as in Irish—he said the Chief Secretary had recognised that in the bilingual regions the study of English would be very much facilitated by the use of Irish as a medium. There was some striking testimony on that point, some of which had already been quoted. He understood that the Member for Waterford had quoted the remarkable speech of Dr. Starkie, and therefore he need not repeat it. There was passage after passage to prove that the result of trying to teach Irish-speaking children English through an English-speaking teacher was that the unfortunate pupils forgot Irish, and did not learn English, so that really there was a double disadvantage. They deprived the child of anything like a scientific and grammatical knowledge of his mother tongue, and at the same time they did not supply the hiatus by a knowledge of the English tongue. A great deal of stress was attached in that House to the vast amount of illiteracy in Ireland, but the explanation was simple. Taking the three counties where illiteracy was highest—namely, Kerry, Donegal, and Galway—which were also the counties where Irish was still largely spoken, the number of those returned as illiterates and as speaking both languages very closely approached each other. In Kerry the number of people who spoke both Irish and English was 69,701, and the illiterates 58,744. In Galway the number who spoke both languages was 107,029, and the illiterates 87,573. His explanation of this was that the children who went to the schools forgot their Irish while they did not learn English. He believed there were official statements to show that a large number of the best trained educationists of Ireland were of opinion that the want of teaching Irish-speaking children by the Irish medium was largely responsible for the vast and tragical amount of illiteracy in these counties. Thus by the mere fact of their inability to learn English they became illiterate. Apart, therefore, from questions of philology and literature, the teaching of children by the medium of Irish and through an Irish-speaking teacher was an urgent, a vital, and a crying necessity of education in Ireland. The Chief Secretary had urged that the duty of encouraging the study of Irish lay not so much with him as with the managers of schools, and that the managers had not shown as strong a desire in this direction by the engagement of Irish-speaking teachers as might have been expected. If that statement were true the right hon. Gentleman would be entitled to say that he had shifted the responsibility from his own shoulders to that of the managers, and that pressure ought to be brought on the managers of schools to supply Irish-speaking teachers. Was the right hon. Gentleman quite right in his statement of facts? He had before him a terse statement of facts prepared by the president of the Irish League in London. He said that 188 school managers, representing 1,075 schools in Irish-speaking districts, had signed a memorial in favour of the training and sending down of bilingual teachers. The memorial was addressed to the National Board of Education. He understood that, as a rule, a teacher was trained in a training college. If a teacher had a colloquial knowledge of Irish there ought to be the means in the training college of making his colloquial knowledge grammatical and scientific, so that he could go down and teach the children. One of the objections raised on this question was that if they sent a teacher to a training college to be taught Irish he would be in the same position, because he would be learning Irish as a foreign tongue. That was not the proposal. The proposal was that the teacher sent to the training college should have a colloquial knowledge of Irish, which could be turned into a grammatical and scientific knowledge. He thought they had a right to demand the assistance of the Government not merely on the grounds of science or literature, but by way of meeting a crying evil in the education of Ireland. It would be the duty of the Gaelic Society and of other societies interested in the question to put pressure, wherever and on whomsoever pressure was needed, in order to bring this question to a practical issue, and to give the people of Ireland the same advantages as the people of Wales, and even the Hebrew children dwelling in Ireland, enjoyed at present.

MR. BUTCHER (York) said the hon. Gentleman had spoken of his desire for the increased study of the Celtic language. He ventured to suggest to him that if the Irish language was to be made the subject of study it must be as a matter of higher education in the universities and not in the primary schools. The discussion had turned on two subjects. The first was whether there should be bilingual education—in other words, whether the Irish language should be used in Irish speaking districts as a means of education. The second demand was that Irish should be encouraged as a separate and distinct branch of learning. Upon the first of these questions he was in entire sympathy with hon. Members from Ireland, and he gathered that the Chief Secretary was of the same view. It was quite obvious, from an educational point of view, that if it was desired to impart instruction in English or in anything else to a boy brought up in an Irish-speaking home, it could be done satisfactorily only by addressing him in the language with which he was familiar. He trusted that as the result of the debate effective steps would speedily be taken to carry such a desirable proposal into practice, and that the bilingual system of instruction would be established in those parts which were characterised as chiefly Irish-speaking districts. But when one came to the question whether Irish should be made a separate and distinct branch of study, that was a different matter. It was not so much a sentimental as a practical business question connected with primary education. Was there time to teach Irish as a separate and distinct branch of education? He conceived not. Effective attention could not be given to a second language in addition to the other subjects which it was necessary boys should be taught. But supposing there was time for a second language, the practical question arose whether it should be Irish. With the greatest possible goodwill to the Irish language, he honestly did not think it would be a business-like operation to teach boys in non-Irish-speaking districts the Irish language. If they had the time and talents to acquire a separate language, French or German would be much more useful to them. From that point of view he could not support the contention that Irish should be taught as a separate and distinct branch of learning in the primary schools of Ireland. Reasons had been advanced why the Irish language should be revived, one of those reasons being that the English language was effete, and that it was unfit to express the great, original, and beautiful ideas of the writer of the letter in which this plea was advanced. He wished that that gentleman had been present and heard the speeches of the Irish Members that night: he would not then have been able to complain of the weakness of the English language. When it was said that the English language was effete, and that the language of Shakespeare was not suitable to convey the beautiful and original thoughts of a man, he had some suspicion that it was not so much the language as the thoughts that were at fault. The question really was a purely educational and business one, and when they had the openly-expressed conviction of the Chief Secretary that for educational purposes it was desirable to insist on the bilingual instruction, they had got as far as they were likely to get with advantage. The debate which had taken place would probably do a great deal of good in enabling the Government to insist upon increased efficacy in the bilingual process of instruction, and with that Irish Members should be content, as it was not possible to push the question further in the direction they had indicated with any advantage, either educationally or commercially, to the people of Ireland.

MR. CREAN (Queen's County, Ossory) complained that Members did not fully realise the demand of the people of Ireland. They did not desire to insist upon Irish being taught to all children; it was to be optional for those attending the schools whether or not they received the instruction. The people had a right to demand the particular studies they wished to have taken up, and the reasonable demand they now made should not be denied. If the English people demanded with the same unanimity as the Irish people had done the encouragement of any particular study, neither the House of Commons nor any Board subordinate to it would dare to withstand that demand for even twenty-four hours. Were the Government going to deny that which would raise the social standing of the Irish people in the world? Why was not a similar course adopted in regard to Scotland and Wales? What reason was there for treating Ireland differently from those two countries? Fifty-seven per cent. of the people on the western seaboard of Ireland were Irish-speaking people, and why should their native tongue be treated in this way? If the House of Commons had not the power to compel the National Board to adopt a different policy in this respect, the sooner a Bill was brought in for the purpose the better. That fossilised Board should be done away with, and a representative Board established which should be responsible to the country, and then the people would be able to get that education which would raise their social and educational standing, and make them what they should be and were before the English nation took them in hand—namely, as intelligent and as educated a people as were to be found in any civilised country on the face of the earth.

DR. TANNER (Cork County, Mid), as representing the district possessing the largest number of Irish-speaking people, supported the demand now being put forward. There were places in county Cork where as many as 92 per cent. of the people were Irish-speaking, and to whom, therefore, this matter was one of very considerable importance. He had again and again come across cases in which the children did not understand what was attempted to be imparted to them by National school teachers who were not versed in the Irish language. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was supposed to "boss" the National Board, but, apparently, the National Board "bossed" the Chief Secretary. It was merely another case of the tail wagging the dog instead of the dog wagging the tail. The hon. Member for York had urged that French or German, rather than Irish, should be taught in primary schools. But who ever heard of any boy learning French or German systematically, and in such a manner as to be able to speak the language, even in the great public schools of England? The classes in which those languages were supposed to be taught were usually the romping-grounds in which the boys made game of the masters, French or German, as the case might be. It was, therefore, absolutely ridiculous to suggest that French or German could be taught in the National schools. He was surprised that the hon. and learned Member for East Down should run down the teaching of Irish, seeing that he had been at Queen's College, Galway.

MR. RENTOUL said there was a Chair of Celtic at Queen's College, Galway, but there were no students, and the professor ultimately died in the workhouse.

DR. TANNER (continuing) said that Irish was deeply studied in most of the universities in Germany, many of the very best scholars coming from that country, and it was time something should be done in Ireland itself. Was there always to be this vendetta? Was it simply because it was Irish that it was not taught? Was there some malign underhand influence at work? Was the object to crush out the language? If that was the case the purpose would never be achieved, as the movement in favour of this demand was growing day by day. At the present time numbers of people who had never given much attention to this matter were now taking it up heart and soul, and although the right hon. Gentleman might affect to despise the minority in the House of Commons, he would not be able to despise the aspirations of a united people to preserve their beloved and living language.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I would not be doing my duty if I did not express my opinion on this subject in company with my colleagues on this side of the House. Two hundred and seventy qualified teachers of Irish are now available in Ireland. But, apart from that, we have a number of the higher classes in Ireland who are qualified to teach Irish. The Gaelic League have done me the honour to elect me one of its vice-presidents. I regret that I was not able in my younger days to learn Irish, but within the last two or three months, I am not ashamed to say, I have received my first lessons in the Celtic language, and many of us wish that such opportunities had been available in the past. It is said that this is a very mischievous movement for labouring men. I know a case of a labouring man who is an honorary member of the Gaelic League, and who, when his day's labour is over, gives his services gratuitously in teaching Irish to the boys and girls of his neighbourhood. I think the time has come when the Government should make some concession in this matter. I do not believe there is a single parish in the county of Kerry in which public meetings have not been held in favour of the bilingual system of education. I believe the discussion to-night will do good yet; and the Irish Members have done their duty nobly in pushing forward the claims of the Gaelic League.

MR. SHEE (Waterford, W.): On very few subjects has there been displayed such intimate knowledge in reference to the question at issue, or with the facts connected with the movement, as has been shown in the course of this debate. The hon. Member for Mid Cork referred to the fact that in his constituency there are 14,000 Irish-speaking people, and claimed that that was a higher number than in any other. Although I represent a constituency in the centre of the south-west of Ireland, the number of Irish-speaking people is double that of Mid Cork.

Dr. Tanner.

DR. TANNER: What I said was that 54 per cent. of my constituents speak Irish.

MR. SHEE: In West Waterford the total population is 35,000, and the number of Irish-speaking people is 28,000, or 75 per cent., and there is a very great desire on the part of all these people to be educated in their own language. I am afraid I cannot coincide in the praise given to the speech of the Chief Secretary. I think a too liberal interpretation has been given to it. As I understand it the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to concede bilingual teaching, but only to concur in any action of the National Board of Education which will permit the use of Irish in Irish-speaking districts for the purpose of enabling pupils to get a knowledge of English. That is an altogether different thing from a bilingual system of education. The demand is, that not merely shall instruction be given in English through the medium of Irish, but that Irish shall be taught as an independent subject. I believe that the Chief Secretary has not said one word in the direction that he is prepared to encourage the teaching of Irish in the schools as a separate subject; and if that is true it is apparent that a malign influence is at work and a desire to prevent the education of Irish children in their own language. A protest should be made from these benches against the scheme of the Government, and I hope that that protest will be made effective. I have been in the House for five years, and for the first time during that period I have received pressing invitations from my constituents to be in my place during this debate. That is only one of the evidences of the fact that there is a very widespread desire that this subject should be treated as one of importance, and that the Government should, with all the energy at our command, be urged to bring about what we aim at. If the right hon. Gentleman has no power at present to do what we want, he has the whole strength of the Government at his back, and there is nothing to prevent him from enforcing his opinion on the Board by a Bill of one clause. There is no parity between the question of the study of French or German in schools and that of the study of Irish. It is not a question of compelling child to learn Irish, or the parents of children, or the managers of schools, provide for the study of the Irish language; but simply of enabling the children to be taught in Irish, if they and their parents wish it. I am sorry at the narrow view taken by the right hon. Gentleman, we have been accustomed to attach too much importance to the allegations of the right hon. Gentleman who represents the Government on these occasions. Although I declared there is no political element in this matter, the right hon. Gentleman has a very narrow view of it. His view is steely cold, and his attitude cannot be described as sympathetic. I hope the right hon. Gentleman has gained a little education this evening, and that when he addresses the House on this subject again he will be able to adopt a more sympathetic attitude.

Question put.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I think the Committee will agree with me that it would be futile, at this time of the morning, to inaugurate a discussion on the new scheme of primary education in Ireland. Up to the present we have discussed only one point, and the broad scheme has not been discussed at all. We are in an unfortunate position with reference to these new rules. As a matter of fact, we have not yet had them in full. We have had what may be described as a summary of the rules, but even that was only put into our hands a few days ago. I make no accusation against the Irish Government in the matter. I think they desired to give us the information as early as possible, but still we did not receive it as early as we ought to have received it. It has been practically impossible for us to gather opinion in Ireland in reference to this new scheme in the few days that have elapsed since the summary was published, and to imagine that we can usefully initiate a discussion now on the new scheme of primary education in Ireland is absurd. A number of very grave questions arise in connection with the scheme which affect not only the general interests of education in Ireland, but also the position of the National teachers, which we naturally ought to protect, and it would be impossible at this hour to adequately discuss them. I would repeat to the Government a suggestion which was made in connection with the subject of Intermediate education in Ireland yesterday—namely, that ample opportunity should be given to us to discuss this question also. I would make an earnest appeal to the Government to give us an undertaking that we shall have an opportunity of discussing what amounts to a revolution in the system of primary education in Ireland. If we get that undertaking I would be in favour of taking no discussion on the new rules to-night. I do not think we have sufficient information to enable us to usefully discuss them. The discussion could not be reported, and would not give any satisfaction to the classes interested in this subject in Ireland. We are discussing not a political question at all, but a change in the whole primary system of education in Ireland. It is essential that this discussion should be taken under conditions which would render it useful and effective, and I would most earnestly appeal to the Government to give us an assurance that an adequate opportunity will be afforded us to discuss this revolution in the system of primary and intermediate education in Ireland. I would suggest that we ought to adjourn the discussion on the primary education changes, and wait for that adequate opportunity when we will have sufficient information about the changes in our possession to enable us to discuss them reasonably. I have always found that the First Lord of the Treasury has been anxious to take a reasonable view, and, so far as consistent with his position, to meet the convenience of Irish Members. I would press upon him that our claim is reasonable, and might fairly be met. A discussion taken now would necessarily be imperfect, and inevitably followed by further discussion later on. I would put it to him that it would be to the interest of the Irish Members, and of general education in Ireland, to accede to our request.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I had hoped that opportunity might have been found for discussing that I recognise is a most important question, but I am aware that another topic will occupy the attention of the Committee. I also recognise that possibly this is too early a stage on which to take a useful discussion of the rules, which have not been in operation for any length of time, and are not in the hands of hon. Gentlemen. I have no doubt that when the next session comes round hon. Gentlemen will have the advantage of a more intimate acquaintance with the wording of the rules, and some experience of how these rules have been working. Under these circumstances I admit there is a great deal that is reasonable and impressive in the appeal of the hon Gentleman. I cannot make a definite promise for next session, but I do admit that the subject is of great importance, and one on which hon. Gentlemen from Ireland may well be anxious for an opportunity of expressing their opinion; and I shall be glad to do everything I can, at a more convenient period, to give every facility for that discussion. With that assurance perhaps the hon. Gentleman will now allow us to take the Vote.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: The point is this, that these new rules have to be on the Table for a certain time, and it is within the province of any Member to raise a discussion upon them then. I think that a whole evening might be adequately devoted to the discussion of the new rules on primary and intermediate education. The right hon. Gentleman says he is not in a position to give a definite pledge for next session. Possibly not; the next session may be the first session of a different Parliament. If I understand his statement aright, subject to that limitation, he recognises that my request is a reasonable one, and that such adequate discussion as I have indicated will be granted. If so, I would express myself as satisfied.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What the hon. Gentleman has asked for is practically that the discussion should occupy a whole night. I will do what I can to prevent the intermediate education rules being discussed at the fag end of the evening. The new rules for primary education would come on in the ordinary course.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now report this Resolution to the House."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. JOHN REDMOND: There are other Votes on the Paper; and I did not understand that these would not be taken. According to the prevalent idea this is the last occasion on which we will have the Irish Estimates in Committee. But if the right hon. Gentleman is in a position to give us an opportunity to discuss the other Votes on the Paper we might report progress. The next Vote deals with the industrial schools, in which profound interest is taken in Ireland. If the motion to report progress is made I shall oppose it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is possible, of course, that some further opportunity might occur before the present session closes. But I do not know that it is very probable, and I cannot hold out any pledge. If the hon. Gentleman desires any further discussion to-night I will meet his wishes; but I am very unwilling to ask the Committee to sit up late.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: It would be better if the right hon. Gentleman could hold out to us some hope that some time would be given before the end of the session to discuss this Industrial School Vote. I do not say that a whole evening should be devoted to it, but if he would give us some opportunity we might adjourn now. It would, however, be better to have some discussion now than none at all.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary made a statement early in the session in regard to this Industrial Schools Vote, and I understood that he undertook to look into the matter to see whether some amelioration of the circular in regard to Industrial schools could not be made. We have not had an opportunity of learning his views on the subject. If he could make some statement on the position now we would be thankful to him, and it may be that it would obviate the necessity of any lengthened discussion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no objection to this Vote being taken, provided the discussion is not too long; and therefore I will not now move to report progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CLASS III.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £54,767, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete a sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Expenses of Reformatory and Industrial Schools in Ireland."

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has not answered my question. Would he state the result of the inquiry that he promised to make earlier in the session?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I do not know exactly what the hon. Gentleman refers to. It is possible that I may have promised at an earlier period of the session that I would look further into the question of whether anything could be done by legislation this session in connection with pauper children. But there has been no opportunity of introducing or even of considering any such legislation.

MR. DILLON: I must say that I am amazed at the statement of the Chief Secretary that his further experience of the working of the circular in regard to the industrial schools has been favourable. All I can say is, that according to the information at our disposal, the experience of those responsible for the industrial schools has been more and more unfavourable in regard to it as time goes on. The history of this transaction will be in the memory of many Members of the House. The whole action of the Chief Secretary has been most singular in this uncalled for interference with a system which was working well—an interference, too, in such a way as to run counter to the unanimous opinion of Ireland, and to upset and threaten with destruction a system which has done an enormous amount of good in Ireland. This circular was issued on 1st October, 1898, and I raised the question in the House for the first time in February, 1899. On that occasion the Chief Secretary referred to the O'Connor Don and some other authorities as inferentially approving of the circular. But he will remember himself that shortly after that debate a most influential deputation, of which the O'Connor Don was a member, waited upon him, and pressed upon him the enormous injury which was being inflicted upon the industrial school system by that circular. The theory of the circular is, that a child in Ireland, before it is admitted into an industrial school must be in some way contaminated. The only information we could extract from the right hon. Gentleman in previous debates as a reason for his extraordinary departure from practice was that certain children were admitted to the industrial schools who would be excluded under a more stringent interpretation of the Act. Mark what was done. For eighteen years the industrial schools system was working in Ireland, and until the right hon. Gentleman came into office it had been the accepted system of the country and had worked untold good. Juvenile crime was almost annihilated by this system and the spirit in which it was worked, and even if the right hon. Gentleman were right in his interpretation, although I think he might be a little more modest, seeing that it was the established practice for eighteen years, he ought to have left well alone. When he was convinced by his legal advisers that the magistrates were giving a rather too liberal interpretation to the Act, he could either have left the system—which he found working admirably—alone, or he could have introduced a one-clause Bill to amend the Act, and bring it into harmony with the system. He, however, issued his circular, the effect of which I will explain to the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to make out that the O'Connor Don took the same view as he did as to the policy and intention of the Act. On Tuesday, 28th November, 1899, a large and representative deputation waited on the Chief Secretary in Dublin, for the purpose of laying their views before him as to the Lord Lieutenant's circular. Amongst those present was the O'Connor Don, and, in the course of a lengthy speech, he said—

Mr. T. M. Healy.

"It was he who introduced the Industrial School Bill into the House of Commons in 1867, and succeeded in having it passed into law in 1868. About fifteen years ago a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the working of the Act. Every result then known with regard to the working of the Act was made known to that Commission, but fifteen years passed after the Report was made before any change came. Last year a circular was issued which, whatever it was intended to do, had the effect of making a considerable alteration in the administration of the Act. It would be sworn that if the Act was administered in the future as it had been lately the effect would be disastrous among the schools of the country. The intentions of the Act of Parliament were not the interpretations which the magistrates were placing on the circular. He did not hold that the circular forced the interpretation which was being put upon it. They had taken the view that destitution alone was no longer any element for committing to industrial schools, and that they were to inquire into the antecedents of the children, and satisfy themselves that if the children were not sent to school they would fall into crime. That was not the intention of the Act. It was intended also to provide for children who, by the destitution or incapacity of their parents, might fall into crime."

That is the opinion of the O'Connor Don. Mark now what the dispute is. According to the circular, a child must be proved to have disreputable or criminal parents, or he must be an associate of criminals—that is to say, contaminated—before he is to be given the saving grace of the industrial schools system in Ireland. The principle of prevention has been altogether destroyed by this circular, and we are no longer permitted to assume that a child found in a state of destitution and without sufficient guardianship is likely to fall into crime. That is no longer a sufficient ground to commit according to the circular. Now see the result. When in a previous debate it was asserted that the right hon. Gentleman was dictating to magistrates in Ireland, he said he had no such intention, that the circular was not in the nature of an order, and was only a reminder of the view taken by the authorities as to the true interpretation of the Act. Certain magistrates, having obtained the information from the right hon. Gentleman that the circular was not intended to coerce, very properly, as I think, continued to commit children as they had done for eighteen years; but the Chief Secretary immediately discharged them, and the discretion of the magistrates was defeated. The bishops of Ireland have taken this matter up, and take the view that we have presented to the Committee. We have been bombarded with complaints from the managers of these schools, pointing out the serious loss, and, in some cases, even the utter destruction, which will follow if the system is persisted in, and therefore we are bound to take every possible opportunity of bringing this gigantic evil before Parliament. In preparation for this debate the hon. Member for Waterford, having had the great gravity and importance of this matter brought under his notice, issued a circular to the managers of these schools asking how the system would affect them, and received several replies from very responsible persons. The Rev. James Hamill, P.P., corresponding manager of St. Patrick's Female Industrial School and the Sacred Heart Industrial School, Belfast, writes as follows—

"We have now thirty vacant places in the Sacred Heart School, although Belfast swarms with children who are fit subjects for admission. The practical result of the circular will be, in a short time, the closing of many of the schools, and the rendering of the remainder less able to continue the work they have undertaken."

I need hardly say that before the circular was issued the difficulty was to find places for the applicants. Sister M. de Sales McGeeney, of the Lurgan Industrial School, writes—

"Our school is going down since the issue of the recent circular. In a few years our school, built at great expense, and still in debt, would be empty. Considering how few schools exist in the north, this would be a great misfortune to the poor."

That brings me to another point. These schools have been built by religious communities at great expense, and it is really monstrous, where local charitable resources have been called into play, that this circular should not only ruin the schools and injure the poor, but render these magnificent buildings useless for the purposes for which they were erected. I do not believe that in the whole world there was such an admirable industrial system as in Ireland. It was a pleasure to go through the schools, the children were so well cared for and so cheerful and happy. The manager of the Sunday's Well School writes—

"It seems quite evident that if children similar to those who have been formerly committed are now deprived of the safeguard of industrial schools, they will of necessity become criminals, for a starving child will steal."

Then the manager of one of the great Dublin schools writes—

"The numbers in the schools are so fast going down that a very few years, perhaps not more than four or five, will put an end to most of them. And the pity of it all! The schools are there—have been an acknowledged success—but they are to be shut up, the children made, perhaps, paupers or criminals of, in preference to changing the words of a legal document. What an enlightened age we live in!"

I really think that language is justified. All these schools have, as I have said, been instrumental in almost abolishing juvenile crime in Ireland. Sister Jones, of the St. Joseph's Industrial School, says—

"Committals have virtually ceased since the issue of this mischievous circular from the Castle authorities to the magistrates in October, 1898, and consequently we have always several vacancies. At present there are twenty-three, and that number is likely to be doubled before the close of the year. Of course this is a serious financial loss, as the general expenses of the establishment must be kept up the same."

From Clifden, Sister Mary Reville writes—

"Should the present restrictions on admission to industrial schools continue to be enforced, the country schools, especially those in our mountainous districts, will very soon be wrecked. If the police are to judge the fitness of the applicant for admission, and not the magistrates, it can easily be seen how this fact must thwart the benevolent intentions of the first framers of the law, which hitherto worked so happily in Ireland."

The manager of Newtonforbes, Longford County, writes—

"We are going down in numbers rapidly. Certified for 145 children, we have twenty-one vacancies, and are likely to have as many more before the year closes. To balance this we have no prospects of fresh committals. We consider the Castle circular has proved most detrimental, so far as the 'committal of children' clause is concerned. Some children have already been discharged by the Chief Secretary, after having been in the institution for short periods, and no reason for such action was made known to us. We have done much to further the interests and welfare of our children, and have spared no expense to fit them for the future in every way. We have spent over £12,000 of our funds (not Government money) to erect buildings for the accommodation of our children, acting under the belief that the institution was never to fail. How is this enormous sum to come back to us, now that there is no better prospect in view than the total destruction of our industrial schools? It is a startling consideration."

I might go on multiplying these cases, but I stop there. I am astonished that the Government should persist in this circular. What is the object? Is it, deliberately against the whole public opinion of Ireland, to wreck a system which any Government ought to be proud of—a system whose object is to take children off the streets of the cities and towns of Ireland and put them into schools where they are trained to earn their bread under the care of self-sacrificing women and men who for the most part work for nothing, and devote the whole of their lives to this mission, and afterwards to plant these children out under happy conditions so as to give them a chance in life? If this system were left alone these children would become self-respecting and self-supporting members of society; but if it is wrecked the children will be permitted to run about the town serving an apprenticeship to crime. A more insane policy I never heard of. The Chief Secretary dropped a hint to the deputation which waited upon him, and also in the debate in the House, that he thought under a lax administration of the law an undue burden had been thrown on the Treasury; that is to say that under the strict letter of the law some of these children ought not to have been received into the industrial schools, as they had been a drain on the British Treasury in a total sum of a few thousand pounds. I put the question, what is to become of these children, and where are they to go to? If they are the children of parents whose circumstances are such that they ought to take care of their own children but wickedly do not, the law should compel them to do so; and if the law is not strong enough for that at present, let the law be strengthened. But if the parents have been reduced to poverty, either through misfortune or sickness, and have no means to support their children, why should not these children be put into industrial schools instead of allowing them to wander about the streets to be placed in the workhouse, where they get the workhouse taint? The result of this circular is that the income of some of the industrial schools has dropped £7,000 or £8,000 a year. The only object of the circular seems to be to save the capitation grant of 5s. for each child. I contend that there was no expenditure in Ireland which was more profitable, and I appeal on that to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because by striking at the tap-root of crime in the country there was a saving to the Government of the expenditure of imprisoning these children in after life. Therefore, I maintain that the policy of driving these children to the streets for the purpose of saving a few thousand pounds is most narrow and foolish. There is not the least use in concealing the fact that the policy is to drive the children into the workhouse, from which they will be boarded out, and their expense charged on the rates, and thus saved to the Treasury. Now the workhouse child has a horrible mark for life, as any one can see who goes into even the best workhouses in Ireland, and contrasts its condition with that of a child in an industrial school conducted by the unions.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: As the hon. Member himself remarks, this question has already been very fully discussed in the House, and I am rather surprised that he has raised it again this evening. He began by quoting a speech of the O'Connor Don on the occasion when a deputation waited upon me in August last. I rather believe that the O'Connor Don himself then stated that he did not think the magistrates had given that interpretation to the circular which it is now said they put upon it. The circular set forth that many of the places in the industrial schools which ought to be occupied by the poor children for whose benefit the Industrial Schools Act was really intended, children, namely, who, if not taken out of their surroundings, would grow up in vice, were now filled by children who suffered from destitution, and destitution only. The proper objects of the Industrial Schools Acts were therefore kept out of the schools by the latter class. That was the whole case. The system was carried on in a manner that was entirely illegal, and the circular was one of many which was issued with the object of preventing these illegalities. The hon. Gentleman says the system went on for eighteen years; that is absolutely contrary to the fact, and in proof of that I would refer to the Report of the Commission which was appointed in 1882, of which the O'Connor Don was a member. The Report states that it is certain that the Industrial Schools Act is regarded as an institution for poor and destitute children rather than for the children of the criminal classes. A number of children, according to the Report, were sent to these schools who did not come within the purview of the Act, and were sent there mainly on the ground of destitution; and there could be no doubt that there were many children who were sent to industrial schools in Ireland who would not be sent in England, with the result that it was apprehended that many children who were proper subjects for these schools were left in the streets. That is the system which the hon. Gentleman says has given satisfaction in Ireland for eighteen years, and he actually suggests to me that I should have the law changed to correspond with the practice instead of having the practice changed to correspond with the law. It comes to this, that the industrial schools of Ireland should be used for the relief of destitution, and that the general taxpayer should be called upon to pay. That principle is not adopted either in England or in Scotland. Let me say a word with regard to the circular. The hon. Gentleman says that the grant-in-aid of the industrial schools in Ireland has been reduced. That is not the fact, because the grant was £100,000 last year, and it will be the same this year. It is true the attendance has been reduced by the circular, and it would be very strange if it had not, because a great number of the children who ought never to have been admitted have been cut off.

The result will, I hope, be a corresponding increase in the number of committals of children of the class for whom the industrial schools are intended. I will give the Committee the figures. Before the circular was issued the number of children committed for begging attending these schools in 1897 was 924; in 1898 it was reduced to 676, and in 1899 to 232. Of children admitted for causes other than begging, who were properly sent to the industrial schools, the number in 1897 was 486, in 1898 562, and in 1899 723. In the face of these figures I think I am justified in concluding that the object of the circular has been achieved, and that these illegalities will no longer take place, and that there will be a considerable increase in the committals of the children for whom the Act is intended.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: The figures quoted by the right hon. Gentleman hardly bear out the statements in the letters which have been received from the managers of industrial schools in Ireland. I do not know how the right hon. Gentleman has arrived at his figures, but those responsible for the administration of the industrial schools system in Ireland declare that the numbers have shown a very considerable falling off. It is perfectly impossible to discuss this question at this hour of the morning, and under such oppressive atmospheric conditions. We have in connection with this matter an instance of the magnificent manner in which Irish affairs are administered. We have only got two days for Irish Supply, and we are supposed to be satisfied, although there are many matters of importance which have not been discussed at all. I wish to ask the Chief Secretary one question. I was a member of a deputation which waited on the right hon. Gentleman on this question, and he informed us that he would make an inquiry as to whether any injury had been inflicted on the industrial schools by the operation of this circular, and that if any injury were inflicted he would see whether it could not be remedied. It would be very interesting if he would inform us what was the result of that inquiry. The Chief Secretary stands on the strict letter of the law, and I assume he has taken legal advice on the matter, but here is the opinion of an eminent legal authority. He says—

“The Lord Lieutenant has no authority to review the decisions of the justices. I attach no weight to the threat that steps will be taken for the discharge of children sent to the school by order of the justices. In my opinion the 11th Section should be interpreted in a large and liberal spirit, and this becomes little more than a legal obligation, having regard to the interpretation put upon the Act and acted on for thirty years. On the faith of this interpretation of the statute, and its judicial exposition by the justices during this long period, schools have been erected at great expense, and mortgage debt incurred, bestowing many blessings on the destitute poor. That all this should be now altered by an executive circular seems to me an injustice and intolerable wrong. The true and large interpretation of the statute is largely supported by the 30th section, which provides for the managers of schools permitting a child to lodge at the dwelling house of his parent. This is certainly not confined to children committed under the 14th section, or to a child whose parent is in prison. It indicates an intention to include a large class who have no visible means of subsistence, i.e., the destitute poor. In my opinion it does include them. The Irish Act purports to extend the English Industrial Schools Act, 1866, to Ireland, from which the 11th section is taken. By the English Act and by another section ‘refractory’ children are included. I recommend that in every case the absence of visible means should be proved.”

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Report of the Commission which sat in 1882 in justification of his action in issuing the circular, but the circular was not issued until sixteen years afterwards, and it is strange that the right hon. Gentleman should have to go back such a number of years to justify his action. The circular was a most unfortunate one. The Act was doing great good in Ireland, and I am very glad the matter has been raised.

DR. COMMINS (Cork, S.E.): One thing strikes me as very curious in regard to this circular. The interpretation of the law belongs to the Bench, not to the Executive, but this is a matter in which the Executive Government is overriding judgments of the Bench which have been accepted for sixteen years. You would not find a parallel for that in England. Even supposing the magistrates were in error, it was a mistake which hurt nobody. Such action as that taken by the Chief Secretary in Ireland would not be possible in England. Would it be tolerated for one moment in England? Not at all. Why was not one of these magisterial decisions taken into the Court of Queen's Bench, instead of an interpretation of the Act being given by the issue of an Executive Minute? By the course pursued we have had the judicial and executive functions confounded.

*MR. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I wish to make reference to a case that has occurred in my constituency, the circumstances of which must appeal to the sympathy of the Committee. The Chief Secretary had mentioned that the Act was designed for the saving of children, who, if not rescued from their surroundings, would grow up in vice, but I failed to see from the observations he dropped that there was any intention on his part to carry out that object. In the autumn of 1899 a family in Abbeyfeale, in the county of Limerick, were deprived of the breadwinner. That family consisted of six children and the mother, who was delicate, and had no means of supporting them. In the ordinary course of events the mother went to the parish priest, and he took the necessary steps to obtain the admission of the children into the Limerick Industrial Schools. There was no objection at first, but Dublin Castle suddenly sent down an order to have the children removed from the industrial school, and sent back to Abbeyfeale, where all they could do was to wander about the streets. That order roused a great deal of indignation in the public mind, and the magistrates, with the concurrence of the resident magistrate, sent an order for the recommitment of the children to the Limerick Industrial Schools; but another order came down from Dublin Castle ordering their discharge. The parish priest wrote to the right hon. Gentleman, but with no effect. I cannot see for a moment where the operation of this Act as now administered is to be of any benefit. Here was a family with no provision for their support, who were decently brought up, and whose father had been a mechanic. The application for their admission to the industrial school had been fully considered by the magistrates and the resident magistrate, and about which no objection had been taken by the inhabitants of the town, who were fully cognisant of the whole circumstances of the case. But they were sent out into the streets by a telegram from Dublin Castle. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman, after all the remonstrances that have been made by magistrates and others, will take some steps to allow these poor children to be sent back to the Limerick Industrial Schools instead of to the workhouse.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope this debate will now be brought to a close and the Vote taken. I was not unwilling that the discussion should be initiated, but it has now proceeded for an hour.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: If it were earlier in the evening, the subject is one of such great interest in Ireland that it ought to be discussed more fully. I recognise, however, that under the circumstances the discussion is now of little or no value, and I do not see any object in prolonging it.

MR. DILLON: In order to obtain a division, I beg formally to move that the Vote be reduced by £10.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £54,757, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Dillon.)

MR. FLAVIN asked if the Chief Secretary had anything to say in regard to the Abbeyfeale case.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said he had taken the advice of the Law Officers on the case, and had been told that it would be illegal to send the children to an industrial school.

Question put.

On Question, motion agreed to.

Moved, That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Lord Lurgan.)

*THE EARL OF MAYO: My Lords, before the motion that the Bill be read a second time is put, I should like to say a few words with regard to this Bill. When the Bill first came before the House of Commons the scheme was a fairly good one, but now it has been completely altered. Under the Bill the promoters are enabled to take water from the river Shannon by means of a canal to enable them to generate electricity and supply electrical energy within a circuit of thirty miles from the commencement of the works. But before they can abstract any water from the river they have to make a weir, the exact situation of which is not decided upon, and cannot be until fresh plans are deposited. They cannot take property to make a weir until they have been to Parliament again, and they cannot take a drop of water until this weir has been constructed. If the Bill passes the company can, under the provisions of Clause 24, proceed, as soon as they have £10,000 capital subscribed, and £2,000 of that sum paid up, to put in force the compulsory powers of the Bill by taking land. Thus, although they may never receive Parliamentary sanction to their future scheme, and consequently never take water, they can proceed at once to insure land with only £2,000 capital in hand. In the present session there are several Bills promoted with the view of authorising the erection of generating stations and the supply of electricity in bulk, but in these Bills the promoters are coming into extensive districts or areas of supply, where local authorities and companies are already established for supplying electricity, or where there are fields of industry already on foot which would provide customers for taking a supply. In this Bill, however, the area of supply is restricted to a small piece of land in a country parish adjacent to the Shannon, where no industries exist, and the same area of land which is provided as the area for supplying power is provided for their generating stations. It is true that by Clause 10 the promoters take power to supply by agreement electricity in bulk to any local authority, company, or person, whose districts, undertakings, factories, mills, or industries are situate within a circuit of thirty miles from the commencement of Work No. 1, but there are no powers in the Bill for carrying mains through intervening districts to reach such authorities, companies, or persons, and the provision is therefore unworkable. Moreover, no proper provision is made for compensating the riparian owners for loss of water. The fishing industries of the Shannon are one of the great features of Ireland, and produce a rental of some considerable value. If the powers are granted which are asked for by this Bill the loss will be considerable to those employed in these industries, to private owners, and to the community generally. Further, in addition to the interference with existing industries connected with the fisheries there will be a serious interference with the navigation of the river Shannon. I trust your Lordships will not agree to the Second Reading of the Bill.

LORD LURGAN: My Lords, I do not intend to detain your Lordships long on this Bill, and had it not been for the very unusual course of procedure adopted by the noble Earl, that of asking your Lordships to reject the Bill on Second Reading, I should have had very little to say. I shall, however, endeavour to convince your Lordships that the proper course in connection with this Bill is that it shall be referred to a Committee. The object of the Bill is to utilise the redundant waters of the River Shannon for the generation of electric current or energy for the use of undertakings, factories, mills, electric tramways, lighting, and other industries situated within the City of Limerick and the district which surrounds it. The River Shannon, as is well known, is the largest river in the United Kingdom, having a drainage area of some 4,500 square miles, and discharging for the greater portion of the year a great volume of water, which for centuries has been running to waste. The works are extremely simple, and present no engineering difficulty. The great power station, where some 8,000 horse-power will be developed, will be situated at Clonlara, distant only about four and a half miles from the City of Limerick, which contains a population of some 36,000 people. Limerick is a seaport possessing great natural advantages for trade and commerce, being situate fifty miles inland on the finest navigable river in the United Kingdom, having deep-water docks, extensive quays, and several systems of railway converging upon them from all parts of the country, as well as water carriage by means of the Grand Canal to Dublin. The noble Lord said there were no large industries which would use the electrical power. I differ from him. The largest bacon factories in Ireland are here, as well as the biggest condensed milk factory in the United Kingdom, and the largest flour mills operating in any city in Ireland. There are saw mills, tanneries, and numerous other industries, all of which require the use of steam power. Limerick, however, being on the West Coast of Ireland, suffers greatly from the fact that it has to pay a very high price for imported coal. Thus, the existing industries are greatly handicapped, while the starting of new factories cannot be contemplated in view of the serious difficulties arising from the high cost of producing power. It is to remedy this state of things that the present undertaking has been brought before Parliament. Ireland possesses little or no coal, but has a considerable amount of water power, which, if properly utilised as in other countries, may largely tend to the development of its industries and the employment of its people. Both Italy and Switzerland are countries possessing no coal, but, like Ireland, they have the great advantage of possessing the cheapest form of power—namely, water power. By the fostering care of the Government and the energy of the people, these two countries have overcome the difficulties arising from the want of coal, and are now rapidly becoming large manufacturing centres. It is needless to refer to the vast developments which have taken place in America and Canada, where water power is used so fully for electrical development applicable to all manufacturing uses. The idea of utilising the waste water power of the Shannon dates back to the time when Sir Robert Kane pointed out the great advantage that would occur to the whole country, from an industrial point of view, if the water power of this great river was properly employed. The case before Parliament is very different from that where water is abstracted from the river and carried away never to be returned again to its original source. Here a portion only—after the fullest allowance has been made for maintaining a great river twice the size of the Thames at Teddington, always flowing down the natural course before any water is abstracted—is utilised for driving the turbines, a supplemental steam plant being provided to meet the possible emergency of a dry summer. The Bill provides that under no circumstances shall any water be abstracted from the river unless and until 90,000 cubic feet a minute, equal to 800,000,000 gallons a day, is passing down the river between the inlet and outlet of the proposed works leading to and from the turbines. At the outlet the whole water is again returned, so that from this point to the sea the river remains absolutely as it was before; and here it is that the valuable fisheries of the Shannon exist. The whole value of the Shannon Fisheries is given as £10,000 a year, but the value of the portion of the river between the inlet and the outlet for which the 90,000 cubic feet a minute is provided is only given by the opponents of the Bill as £2,500 a year. The strongest evidence has been given that with the large flow provided under the clauses of the Board of Works and the Fishery Board no injury will be sustained, but the Bill provides the usual clauses for safeguarding the interests of any persons proved to be injuriously affected; and if the Bill is sent to the Committee in the usual way every opportunity will be afforded to those represented in the solitary petition that remains against the preamble to prove their case. When the Bill was first introduced some six petitions were lodged against it. The most important of these was the petition of the Public Board of Works in Ireland, who, under Act of Parliament, are the custodians of the River Shannon throughout its entire course from Lough Allen to the sea, a distance of some 150 miles, their especial duty being the maintenance of the navigation and the regulations of the floods for drainage purposes. Allied with them to a large extent were the inspectors of Irish fisheries, also constituted by Act of Parliament and now incorporated into the Irish Agricultural Board, presided over by the Chief Secretary and the Right Hon. Horace Plunkett. These two Government bodies having the charge of the navigation and the fisheries considered with the greatest care the project now before Parliament as affecting the questions of navigation and fisheries, and, after several months of negotiation, clauses of a very stringent character were put forward in the joint interests of the two bodies, accepted by the promoters, and embodied in the Bill. By these clauses it is provided that no water shall be taken from the river until the 90,000 cubic feet, before referred to, passes over the weir situated below the proposed intake of the canal, and, further, that the Board of Works shall have the right to shut down the sluices on the promoter's canal the moment a less quantity than 90,000 cubic feet a minute is passing down the river. Numerous other clauses have been embodied giving power to the Board of Works and the Fishery Board to control the regulating weir and sluices, to provide such openings for salmon, eels, and other fish as they may deem requisite, and to oblige the promoters to put up such screens at the inlet and outlet as may be thought desirable. Thus in every manner the fullest precautions have been taken by the two public Departments to safeguard the public interests. Of the other petitions, that of next importance was the petition of the Corporation of Limerick for the protection of their waterworks, but here, again, after the most careful investigation and a report made to the corporation by a very experienced waterworks engineer, that body came to the conclusion that it was in the best interests of the city that the project should be carried out. They have, in fact, settled clauses and sealed a petition in favour of the Bill, and will appear before the Committee of your Lordships' House to support it in every way in their power. In like manner the Harbour Board of Limerick have sealed a petition in favour, and by glancing at the statement made by the promoters it will be observed that twenty-three bodies, including the county councils of Limerick, Clare, and Tipperary, all the district councils in the proposed area of supply, the boards of guardians and numerous other bodies have sealed petitions or passed resolutions, in almost every case unanimously urging upon Parliament the desirability of passing the Bill. It is significant that the Commissioners of Public Works have absolutely petitioned your Lordships' House against alterations, and paragraph 3 of that petition recites that—

"During the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons, clauses were introduced for the protection of the petitioners, and your petitioners are content with the Bill as the same is now settled."

They beg that no alteration should be made, and that the Bill should pass into law as it now stands, showing that they, as representing not only themselves, but as acting in concert with the Fishery Board, are fully satisfied that the promoters have agreed to every reasonable condition. It would, therefore, seem in the public interest that the unusual course adopted by the opponents to destroy the Bill on the Second Reading, after it has passed every stage in the House of Commons, should be resisted by your Lordships' House, and that no narrow view or petty interest should be allowed to stand in the way of a project which must confer lasting benefits on the whole community.

*LORD MASSY: My Lords, as one of the riparian owners and an owner of Shannon fisheries I have great pleasure in supporting my noble friend's motion to reject the Bill. If this Bill becomes law a large portion of a very important spawning bed between Limerick and Castle Connell will be left high and dry at the most critical time of the year—namely, from 1st November to 1st February, when the fish are spawning. The other portion of the spawning bed will have so little water flowing over it that it will be perfectly impossible for heavy salmon to spawn. Not only rod fishing, but the fisheries in general all along the Shannon, will be interfered with by this Bill. The noble Lord said the water will be all returned. True, but between the inlet and the outlet there are several miles of river that will be left practically dry. The noble Lord said the promoters proposed to place their generating station at Clonlara, and to transmit electricity from there to the principal works in Limerick; but, as a matter of fact, not a single one of those mercantile works has applied for electrical energy, knowing perfectly well that they can work their machinery, as they do now, by steam at a much less cost for power than would be the case if they used electricity. The noble Lord said the Fishery Board has supported this Bill. They may have done so, but they have withheld their Report, which looks very much as if the Reports of the Fishery Inspectors were dead against it.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): My Lords, I think the House, after having heard the speeches that have been delivered, will have come to the conclusion, without a shadow of a doubt, that this Bill ought not to be stopped at the Second Reading. The Bill is one for a very large commercial enterprise. It has passed through the House of Commons, it was fought in Committee there, and it is extremely unusual, I may say quite unparalleled, that it should be thrown out on Second Reading. I am surprised that the noble Earl should have adopted the unusual course of asking the House to reject it at this stage. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more, but I hope your Lordships will give the Bill a Second Reading and allow it to go to Committee.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed; the Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I desire to ask the noble Marquess the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether it is his intention to lay upon the Table of the House any Papers relating to Chinese affairs, and, if so, whether they are likely to be presented soon.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): In reply to the noble Earl, I have to say that the Papers in regard to Chinese affairs are in an advanced state of preparation, but that, as they involve communications with other European Powers, a certain amount of reference is necessary before they can be laid upon the Table of the House. I hope, however, the delay will not be very long, and that they will be laid on the Table in a few days.

EDUCATION BILL [H.L.]

[SECOND READING.]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Duke of Devonshire.)

LORD NORTON: My Lords, I should like to call your Lordships' attention to a feature in this Bill, and one that has appeared in every proposition which has lately been made for the purpose of secondary education, which seems to me of the gravest importance and fraught with mischief to this country. I hope we are not entering now upon a course of free secondary education for all classes in the country. The Bill, if extended and developed, as I have no doubt it will be next session, seems to me to be a most satisfactory mode of dealing with this important subject, but it must be borne in mind that the Bill cannot be all one would wish, because it has to deal with a subject which is already very much complicated. It has not a free field. The field is already largely occupied and is being more occupied every year, so that the Bill cannot propose the best scheme in the abstract, but the scheme which will least conflict with what is going on already. It cannot organise, as it pretends to do, a system of local authorities for secondary education throughout the country, but has to co-organise with what is largely existing at present with as little conflict as possible. It will be observed that there is no attempt in this Bill to draw any line of demarcation between secondary and elementary education. The whole is handed over to the central authority, which we constituted last year, with a principal secretary at the head and two principal assistant secretaries under him, who are stated to be for two branches—one for elementary education and the other for secondary education. But there is no attempt whatever made in the Bill to draw the distinction between the one and the other. The nearest thing to a definition is in the title of the Bill which calls everything secondary that is not elementary, but that does not give a very distinct idea of what the intention of the Bill is. The Bill proposes to hand over all public money hitherto devoted to secondary education to county councils and other local authorities. What is known as the "beer-money," amounting to nearly a million a year, and the local rate for technical instruction are handed over, and a public seizure of private endowments. But it is not proposed to ask the rich manufacturers and the tradesmen, who will make use of this Bill for the education of their sons for lucrative employments, for one penny by way of fees. I do not think it is right or safe that we should undertake in this country to give rich manufacturers and well-to-do tradesmen the apprenticeship of their sons to remunerative employments at the public expense, for that is what the Bill amounts to. The pros and cons of free secondary education were amply discussed in the Report of the Royal Commission, who rightly came to a conclusion against it. Though there is no line drawn between elementary and secondary education, yet we must all understand what elementary and secondary education broadly mean as distinguished one from the other. Secondary education is in the nature of higher scientific instruction, and, in fact, when you consider the class to whom it applies, it is practically an apprenticeship to industrial and skilled employments. Technical instruction is included in secondary education generally, and I observed that, when the noble Duke said that, there was a murmur of approval, showing that the House approved of the merging of technical instruction into secondary education generally. But if secondary education is a higher class of instruction for a higher class of society, who are perfectly capable of paying for their own sons' education, I maintain that it is a matter for serious consideration whether the State should undertake it for them, and relieve them of their primary and most important natural responsibility. I think that we have gone too far already in the way of gratuitous education, in the elementary schools of this country. I attribute the lax attendance in elementary schools, complained of in all the recent reports of inspectors, to the depreciation in the estimate of parents of that education of their children which is forced upon them as a public gift. A thing that is offered for nothing is supposed to be worth nothing. If we extend gratuitous education where there is no excuse of poverty at all we shall strike a blow at the spirit of independence and self administration in the people. It is a minor consideration that taxpayers who have no use of the schools will resent having to pay for those who have. For secondary education which is of a higher kind, the whole expense in the schools so provided should be covered by the fees of the well-to-do parents who take advantage of them. I am for an unlimited number of free scholarships for the poorer classes where there is any case of exceptional aptitude shown for higher scientific education; but I would make wealthy parents defray the cost of the education of their children. The idea of the doctrinaires who are pushing us on in this ideal scheme is, a free State education which should include Eton and Harrow up to the Universities—they are really trying to force upon this country a Prussian State system of education for all classes. They are always quoting foreign schools as inferior to ours, and advising us to imitate them, but I am quite certain England has not the slightest wish to do so. The feeling in this country I am sure is very much more in favour of the independent education of their children by capable parents. They have no wish to introduce the Prussian system here. I do not believe there is an Englishman who does not think an English youth is preferable to a German student. I fear that the present private enterprise and municipal ambition in promoting secondary education will be stopped if such education is to be paid for by public money for all classes; and when the Bill is brought up next year I will move that the cost shall be generally met by fees, and public money which is devoted to secondary education shall be spent in providing free scholarships for the poorer classes. To define poorer classes may be somewhat difficult, but it is done by their limit of income, or by their belonging to the wage-earning classes.

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I was very glad to give way to my noble friend Lord Norton when he rose to speak on this subject, for he has a much longer experience than I have of these matters, and his opinion ought to be heard with attention by your Lordships. I shall not follow my noble friend through the arguments he has used. I, for one, am not likely to approve of any system which is to introduce what he calls the Prussian system into this country. I value extremely the peculiar, perhaps, but independent education given in this country, and I should be the last to approve of trying to found a new system on the lines of those we see abroad. I shall not follow the noble Lord even on the subject of free education. I shall leave that to the noble Duke who will reply, but I am at a loss to see the danger there is in this Bill on that subject. Certainly, if the noble Lord urges his view against free primary education as well as this I should not agree with him. The discussion to-night must be somewhat academic, as the noble Duke has announced that he does not intend to carry the Bill beyond the Second Reading this year, but he challenges those of us in this House who are interested in the subject to discuss the measure. I confess that I was somewhat surprised when my noble friend the noble Duke made his speech in introducing the Bill to find that three parts of that speech was confined to a description of the reorganisation of the Education Department, and only a small portion of it, in comparison, to a description of the Bill itself. When I had the Bill in my hands, however, I was not surprised at the importance which the noble Duke attached to the reorganisation of the Education Department, for I will venture to say that very large, I think too large, powers have been given to the Education Board without Parliamentary restrictions, and therefore it is of more consequence than even that the Board shall be placed on such a footing that the country will repose confidence in it. I do not, myself, object to the proposals which the noble Duke has made for rearranging the system of dividing the work of the Education Department. I do not materially differ from that course, for I have always held that all parts of education should be bound together. They are co-ordinate one with the other—primary, secondary, and technical. Each must depend and have a direct influence on the other, and I therefore do not seriously object to the noble Duke's change of attitude in having only two principal assistant secretaries, one for primary education and the other for both secondary and technical education. But I am bound to say that, very properly, a good deal of notice outside Parliament has been taken of the manner in which the noble Duke has made these appointments. At the head of secondary and technical education the noble Duke has placed a very able man—Sir William Abney. I for one shall not say a word against Sir William Abney. I know him to be a man of first class ability, and I should say of liberal and broad views; but he has been entirely, so far as education is concerned, connected with science and art, and there is a fear outside that if he is placed at the head of the proposed double Department he may lay too much stress on science and art, and not deal as broadly and as liberally as he ought with secondary education. That view is somewhat strengthened when it is seen what has been done as regards the assistant secretaries. There are two assistant secretaries already, and two more have been added. The two present assistant secretaries are old South Kensington men, entirely devoted to the Science and Art Department, and one of the new assistant secretaries, whom the noble Duke did not name the other day, is to be connected with the technological system. Therefore, three out of the four assistant secretaries are directly connected with technical education. The fourth assistant secretary, Mr. Bruce, a man of whom I speak with the highest possible admiration, is to deal with the secondary part of education. He possesses all the qualifications for dealing with the subject, and was Secretary to the Secondary Education Commission, which brought so many important facts to bear on this subject, and whose Report is of such great value. There are many persons of influence interested in education who feel that Mr. Bruce ought to have been a joint principal secretary with Sir William Abney, instead of being placed under him. I wish for a moment to refer to what the noble Duke said in moving the First Reading of this Bill, and which, I think, may have been misunderstood in the country. The noble Duke—I am quoting from The Parliamentary Debates—said—

“We hope and intend that the idea of the future education branch of the office will be to make science and art instruction a part of general education in addition to those clerical and literary studies which have hitherto formed its main portion.”

With that I entirely agree; but the Lord President went on to say—

“In the schools and institutions directly assisted by the Board of Education the teaching of science and of art, with the addition, perhaps, of some commercial subjects, will probably remain the principal object.”

The noble Duke went on to refer to the older secondary schools, and said—

“We hope that the scientific resources of the Board will be placed at their disposal if they desire, as many of them do desire, to develop the more modern side of instruction and education. . . . As I have said, it probably will be the case that any interposition of the Board in regard to secondary education will be in the direction of endeavouring to substitute more modern for the older studies; but it ought not to be difficult to find administrators of sufficiently wide knowledge and experience to make the latter result impossible.”

Those sentences of the noble Duke seem to imply that the new development is almost entirely to be in science and art, and he ends in this remarkable way, referring to Mr. Bruce—

“Under him (Sir William Abney) the assistant secretary, who will be chiefly concerned with the literary side of instruction, will be Mr. Bruce.”

With regard to that, I think the noble Duke has suffered some injustice, because in the report of his speech in the public press, which has been circulated throughout the country, a very important word is left out. In The Times the noble Duke is reported to have said—

“Under him the assistant secretary, who will be concerned with the literary side of instruction, will be Mr. Bruce.”

The important word “chiefly” is omitted, and I think it is only fair to the noble Duke that I should mention this, as the insertion of the word makes all the difference. I am afraid that the speech of the noble Duke in introducing the Bill will create the impression in the country that the new Education Board will lean a great deal more to the old Science and Art modes of action than to a genuine and sound system of secondary education, which is so much wanted. I hope the noble Duke will be able to be more explicit than he was on that occasion as to his views when he replies to the debate to-night. If he leaves the case as it now stands I am afraid there will be a considerable chance of the Department losing the confidence of those interested in education. I now come to the Bill itself. I am afraid there will be some disappointment in regard to it. The Bill is not as far-reaching as it might be, and I am afraid it will not establish in the country the means of secondary education which are so much wanted. When I say that I am not for a moment wishing that in every locality, quite irrespective of its requirements, a new secondary school should be erected; but I think secondary education should be within the reach of every clever boy or girl in the country by means of scholarships or otherwise. What do we find elsewhere? In other countries and in the colonies we find such a system in existence. You will find in almost every district in the colonies an admirable secondary school, established sometimes with free education, which my noble friend Lord Norton dislikes so very much, and sometimes with low fees. Not many years ago I had the pleasure of visiting a fine set of schools at Winnipeg, in Manitoba. I found there an admirable primary school, and there was in the same building a secondary school, admirably furnished and admirably equipped for giving secondary education to all within reach of that school. I think the people of this country may really have a serious complaint to make of Parliaments and Governments if they put the young men and women of this country at a serious disadvantage as compared with those in the colonies. I at once admit that there are certain parts of the Bill to which I can give my hearty approval, such as the provision which makes it compulsory on local authorities to use the whole of the “whisky money,” or, as the noble Lord opposite called it, the “beer money,” for education. I do not know that that will reach very far, for I am happy to think there are very few districts in which the money is devoted to the relief of rates or for any other purpose than education. I welcome also the alteration in the rate. It is not altogether an increase of a penny in the £, as I think the noble Duke explained, for in some places urban authorities can raise a penny in the £, and in the same county the county authority may do the same; but in the arrangement proposed in this Bill the county authorities will have the whole distribution and control of this twopence in the £. I think there will be considerable gain by doing away with the fiction which now exists in the definition of technical and secondary education in many places. The county authorities, believing that it is absolutely necessary that there should be a system of sound secondary education before trying to engraft into it technical education, have strained that principle and there has been considerable fiction in what has been done with regard to this point. In my opinion the method by which the Bill proposes to raise the new authorities for secondary education is much too vague. A great deal too much is left to the Department without any control, or very little control, by Parliament. In a matter of such great national importance, Parliament ought to lay down very precisely certain conditions on which these bodies are to be formed. The noble Duke has probably taken the machinery for this to some extent from the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, but he has not followed the precedent of that Act very closely. In that Act there was a special joint Committee for proposing schemes created before the final authority was made. I do not know that the difference is very great, but the present Bill leaves it to the county council to form the scheme and submit it to the Education Board. I think the other plan would be more preferable, and would bring more local interest to bear. I recognise that a certain amount of elasticity must be introduced for the formation of these schemes. Speaking roughly, there are two bodies, or two kinds of bodies that have to be considered. There are urban bodies and rural bodies. The urban bodies are in a very different position from the rural bodies, for they cover what are called the non-county towns. I know that raises a very difficult question, but at some time or other it will have to be faced. Possibly the noble Duke will say it will be faced by the schemes which will be submitted to the Department by the county councils. I for one should like very much to see certain elected bodies represented on these Committees for managing secondary education. There are a great many references in the Bill, and it is not quite clear whether certain matters are included in it or not. I do not know whether when a council aids a school they are entitled to place on the management of that school representatives in proportion to the grant made. This is to my mind most essential. I think county councils ought in every case to have a majority on the Committees, and in the towns I should like to see the school boards represent the minority. It is essential, particularly in towns, that near connection should be maintained between primary and secondary education. There are difficulties, such as those to which the noble Duke alluded, as to higher grade schools which will be removed to a large extent by having representatives of the school boards who have to deal with these higher grade schools on the committees for managing secondary education. In rural districts, I know, this will be impossible, for there are not school boards all over the country. I deeply regret this. I am not against Voluntary schools, and I do not wish to see them all turned into Board schools, but I do wish to see throughout the country school boards established through which the sums voted by Parliament or the rates should pass. At present no such bodies exist in many rural districts; and, therefore, it is impossible to lay down that the rural county councils should have representatives of school boards on their committees. It seems, therefore, probable that with regard to these rural county councils some system of co-optation will have to be agreed to, but I should be opposed to Government nomination. Universities and colleges are named. That may be all very well in certain places where colleges or universities are placed in the midst of counties, but there are many counties where this could not take place. I now come to certain other difficulties which I see in the Bill. To those who have followed the education debates and discussions throughout the country it must be a matter of deep sorrow that such bitter feuds should exist with regard to matters connected with the religious question in primary schools. I believe that the very fact of the existence of these feuds prevents the spread and the management in the best way of education throughout the country. Happily, up to this moment technical education has not had any difficulty of this sort. I wish I could think that this Bill would not introduce any difficulty in the future, but I confess that I fear that some clauses of the Bill may bring the religious feud into questions connected with secondary education. The noble Duke may be able to explain the clauses better than they are understood elsewhere, but there are many people who believe—and there is reason for thinking they are right in their belief—that you will be able under this Bill, with hardly any restriction on the management, to what is called bolster up purely denominational schools by the large grants made to them for apparatus and various other matters. I must say I should deeply regret that, and I am quite certain there will be throughout the country very strong opposition to anything which might be regarded as indirect endowments to denominational secondary schools without any representative control. I should be content, and I know a great many of those with whom I have been spoken would be content, if the noble Duke introduced into the Bill some such restrictions or conditions with regard to religious instruction, as are to be found in the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, and I hope that if the Bill comes before Parliament again it will be modified in this respect. I come now to the question of private schools. No doubt there are a great many private schools in the country which give very good secondary education. I should be very sorry to see those schools deprived, under certain conditions, of the benefits which would arise under inspection, or to prevent clever boys from them winning scholarships under these schemes; but I confess I have a strong opinion that private schools for secondary education should not directly receive aid under this Bill. I have admitted that there are very excellent private schools, but private schools depend on the skill of the man who is at the head of them. He is often a very clever man, and makes the school succeed and become a great financial success; but, should death unfortunately remove him, would it be right to go on with his successor, who might be a perfectly incompetent person? If you once get committed to aids to a particular school it is very difficult, on the first change of the headmaster, to give up making your grant. It is quite different in the case of public companies, who manage their schools on a broad and liberal basis. I should be quite ready to agree to exceptional treatment being allowed to some of these private schools which are under public companies not making a large profit. Unless something of this kind is done, I am afraid that there will be a race on the part of private schools to obtain grants under the Bill, and there will be a chance, in certain districts, at all events, of a great many incompetent schools, giving secondary education, receiving these grants. I therefore do not like the third section of Clause 3. There are certain omissions from the Bill, some of which are of considerable importance. I do not find a clause throwing upon the local authority the duty of satisfying public demands for secondary education in their district. I have in vain searched for it. I have looked back at some of the other Acts which are to be read with this Bill; and I am afraid I do not see anything which will meet the difficulty. It seems to me absolutely necessary, if you are to provide sufficient secondary education for every child all over the country, that the duty should be thrown on the authority managing secondary education to provide such education as the demands of the district require. There is another omission. There is no clause in this Bill like the seventeenth clause of the Bill of 1896.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Duke of DEVONSHIRE): The Bill of 1896?

EARL SPENCER: I mean the Bill that did not pass. That clause is of great importance for this reason. Ever since this subject has been dealt with it has always been urged that the endowments which exist in different parts of the country should be used for the purpose for which they were originally intended—namely, secondary education. We all know that in many districts numbers of these grammar schools have fallen into a hopeless state of decrepitude. Their
